This book is the culmination of a long period of study and as such it benefited a great deal from the generosity of numerous scholars. They have read or heard parts of this study in draft and have responded with criticisms and encouragement. They provided many penetrating observations and their professional expertise and patience helped us to produce the final work. In preparing these acknowledgements, the unavoidable risk is that of making an incomplete list of the many persons who directly or indirectly influenced and guided our ideas. We have tried to respond to their suggestions and advice as best we could, but many of their comments made clear how far we are from having the final word on the subject.

This work has profited enormously from the valuable comments, encouragement and moral support of Kenneth J. Arrow, Giorgio Brosio, James M. Buchanan, Domenico Da Empoli, Francesco Forte, Gianluigi Galeotti, Arye Hillman, Antonio Martino, Dennis C. Mueller, William Niskanen, Mancur Olson, Giancesare Romagnoli, Norman Schofield and Vito Tanzi, who contributed in shaping our thoughts at different stages of the manuscript. Many of the ideas in the chapters of this study were presented in conferences in Europe and the United States and we are greatly indebted to Bruno S. Frey, Daniela Giannetti, John Matsusaka, Patrick McNutt, Michael Munger, Jacob Paroush, Pierre Salmon and Olga Shvetsova who, acting as discussants, gave us helpful and stimulating comments which significantly improved the final product. Special mentions go to Bernard Grofman, who provided leads to interesting references, support for new ideas and hypotheses and suggestions about where to look next, and to Charles K. Rowley for being a continual source of support and sage advice.

Some colleagues with whom we have co-authored will find versions of their work embodied in the text. In this context we should like to mention Diego Lignana and Carmela Nicosia. To them go our sincere thanks for many stimulating and penetrating discussions. The data collection, essential in various parts of the research program, was supported by Adelfio Basile, Gianni Pilo and Pierpaolo Parenti (the latter two from the electoral consulting agency DIAKRON in Milan). Thanks are also due to Martin Ricketts and Malcolm Rees, who read the whole of an early draft and provided detailed comments and observations. We also want to acknowledge the help of friends who, in one way or the other, supplied non-academic criticisms that have been very influential in our 'academic' interpretation of Italian politics.

We acknowledge the financial support of the University of Messina, the University of Buckingham, DIAKRON and the Consiglio Nazionale delle Ricerche (Rome). Without the generosity of these institutions our frequent research meetings in Italy, England and the US would have been impossible. We also acknowledge the support of the University of Reading, Case Western Reserve University, George Mason University and the University of California, Irvine for providing research facilities at various points during our work on this book.

We should like to express our thanks to Edward Elgar, whose interest in our work gave us the determination to complete the study.

Finally, any work of this magnitude involves extended periods of stress for members of one's family. Our families have been particularly gracious in accepting our extended absences from home in the name of this research.
