Acknowledgements

In the course of this research, a number of scholars have assisted me generously. I have cited their contributions in the endnotes, but undoubtedly I have omitted some intellectual debts incurred over the long course of writing this book. I express a general thanks to the scholars whose ideas and support have contributed to the completion of this project.

In particular, I am indebted to Professor Hans E. Jensen. Throughout my professional career, he has been a constant source of sound counsel, and he has continued to provide unstinting support and friendship during the writing of this book. At several points in its evolution, he gave the text a critical reading, and it was with his enthusiastic encouragement that I took this project beyond a dissertation.

I also thank other professional associates who commented on ideas in and drafts of this manuscript. Anne Mayhew, William E. Cole, James R. Carter and Scott Brugger read early versions and provided helpful suggestions for its improvement. Ross B. Emmett read early work on Frank Knight and contributed indispensable comments that improved that chapter and provided more general insights about Chicago economics during the interwar period. William J. Barber, Bradley Bateman, Robert W. Dimand, J. Daniel Hammond, and Mary S. Morgan supplied helpful comments on early work on Henry Simons. Finally, Ingrid H. Rima provided valuable comments on the chapter on Robert E. Lucas, Jr and more generally has encouraged my development as a historian of economics. Whatever errors remain in my work, however, are solely my responsibility.

In carrying out this research, I also benefited from my association with Maryville College. I received financial assistance from the Parker Fund to travel to the Regenstein Library at the University of Chicago to review the papers of Henry C. Simons and to support a leave during the fall semester 2001 to complete the manuscript. In addition, due to Maryville College’s membership in the Appalachian College Association, I received funds that enabled me to travel to professional meetings to confer with fellow scholars studying the evolution of twentieth-century economics.
I would also like to thank the people at Edward Elgar Publishing Ltd. Edward Elgar encouraged me to undertake the project, and Francine O’Sullivan, Joanne Broom and Bob Pickens helped bring it to publication.

The publishers wish to thank the following who have kindly given permission for the use of copyright material:

Finally, I want to thank my family. My children Kara Eliza Kasper and Andrew Adams Kasper grew up with this book and actively cheered on its completion. With his assistance, encouragement and good humor, my husband James Fowler Kasper has helped me to achieve ambitions nearly unimaginable when we met so many years ago, both with the completion of this project and throughout our life together.
