Writing a book, even a sole authored one, requires the work of large numbers of people. This book is no exception. While many people have made this book possible, the most important of them has been my colleague and mentor, S. Venkataraman. Venkat helped with this book in almost too many ways to list. As my dissertation advisor, his ideas and approach to entrepreneurship research have shaped my thinking over the past 13 years. His 1997 article ‘The distinctive domain of entrepreneurship’ in Advances in Entrepreneurship, Firm Emergence, and Growth, first proposed the individual–opportunity nexus as a lens to examine entrepreneurship, and dramatically altered my thinking about this topic, leading to many of the ideas presented in this book. Our co-authorship of ‘The promise of entrepreneurship as a field of research’ in Academy of Management Review provided the basic framework for this book.

Over the years, I also have been fortunate to have several additional collaborators who have taught me a great deal about entrepreneurship. Although there have been many, four have been particularly important in helping to shape the ideas in this book. Dan Cable and I have collaborated on several papers on new venture finance over the past six years. Chapter 8 of this book is very much an outgrowth of my work with Dan. Frederic Delmar has been my collaborator on a series of empirical studies of the new firm formation process, examining a random sample of newly formed Swedish firms. My discussions with Frederic, both in person and via email, have greatly sharpened my thinking about many of the ideas presented here. Jon Eckhardt was a collaborator on two conceptual articles that greatly expanded the individual–opportunity nexus as outlined in my Academy of Management Review article with Venkat. Jon’s probing and challenging questions helped me to significantly expand on many of the key ideas in my earlier work on this topic. In particular, many of the ideas in Chapters 2 and 3 of this book would not have been possible without my collaboration with Jon over the past several years. Bill Gartner and I wrote an article together in the early 1990s that helped to shape my thinking about the role of institutional factors in entrepreneurship. Moreover, Bill’s tireless efforts to convince me of the importance of the entrepreneurial process finally led me to pay attention to that topic, a recognition that greatly spurred my understanding of the field and made it possible for me to write Chapter 10 of this book.

During my earliest years as a researcher, I benefited greatly from the support and encouragement of Ian MacMillan. Not only did Mac support me financially through the Ph.D. program in Management at Wharton, but also he kept me from quitting the program when I wasn’t doing well. To the extent that my scholarly work has any impact on the field of entrepreneurship, people should attribute a large portion of that impact to Mac’s efforts to keep me in academia. Without him, I would not be a professor today.

Several other colleagues also need to be acknowledged as work with them led to many of the ideas and research in this book: Pierre Azoulay, Robert Baron, Chris Collins, Maw Der Foo, Dante DiGregorio, Riitta Katila, Rakesh Khurana, Ed Locke, Atul Nerkar, Wes Sine and Toby Stuart. In addition, several other colleagues have helped me over the years by discussing many of my ideas about entrepreneurship: Bob Baum, Terry Blum, Per Davidsson, Brent Goldfarb, David Kirsch, Rudy Lamone, Ed Roberts, Saras Sarasvathy, Scott Stern, Rama Velamuri and Eric Von Hippel.

I also owe a debt of gratitude to the participants in the one-week intensive Ph.D. seminar in entrepreneurship that I have run at the University of Maryland over the past two years. There is nothing like presenting your ideas to a bunch of highly trained and critical Ph.D. students to lead you to discover the errors and omissions in your work and lead you to correct them.

Several people did me a tremendous service in reading and commenting on an earlier draft of this book. Frederic Delmar not only read the book, but also gave me detailed and extensive comments that allowed me to greatly improve the final version of the manuscript before publication. Robert Baron read the entire manuscript and gave me extensive comments on Chapter 5, which greatly improved that chapter. Bill Gartner, Chuck Allen and Pat Maggitti also read through the entire book and gave feedback. My research assistant, Stephanie Materese, checked references, tables, quotations, grammar and style, and caught numerous errors that I would otherwise have missed.

Lastly, I have to thank my daughter, Hannah, for being such a good baby that I could concentrate on finishing this book in the first few months of her life. I also have to thank my wife, Lynne, for encouraging me to write this book and then spending countless hours talking to me about the academic field of entrepreneurship, when I am sure that she would have rather discussed just about anything else. Moreover, I cannot thank Lynne enough for supporting me through writing this book by getting everything ready for Hannah, and then by doing more than her fair share of Hannah care so that I could get this book out to the publisher.
