Tables

1.1 The ‘new economy’: a whole variety of characterizations and approaches 10
2.1 The likelihood that market competition will lead to the domination of one particular firm or technology 15
2.2 The strategies available to ICT in response to positive externalities 20
2.3 The different uses of the Internet 22
3.1 Productivity gains are concentrated in information-related durable goods 29
3.2 Can ICT generate a strong and durable recovery in productivity? 34
3.3 The many different factors underlying the adoption of e-commerce 38
3.4 E-commerce’s probable impact on industrial organization – various sectoral patterns 39
3.5 Productivity has accelerated at a very different rate depending on the sector 41
4.1 The growth regimes that were supposed to succeed Fordism: many candidates, but few victors 46
6.1 Most ‘new economy’ start-ups do not have viable share prices 82
6.2 Putting ICT in a historical perspective 92
6.3 A taxonomy of the shift from traditional trade to electronic commerce 96
7.1 What the ‘new economy’ promised and what it actually achieved 102
7.2 The mode of regulation that is implicit to ICT does not entail perfect competition 111
8.1 ICT’s impact on the emergence of a new form of company: the real-time company 122
8.2 Information, networks, knowledge: three distinct growth regimes 126
8.3 The United States has been redeploying its research efforts to emphasize the health sector 142

x