Books, especially collections of articles, do not happen by themselves, but require the willing assistance of quite a few others along the way. There are therefore a number of others to whom I wish to express my gratitude for their assistance in getting this completed and within the tight time frames that were set.

I am, of course, indebted to the authors whose papers are found in this volume. Not only have they provided me with their articles on time and within the deadlines set, but each has written a chapter that has looked at the Global Financial Crisis in ways that are well outside the mainstream but from within distinct and recognized divisions of economic theory as it now is. These were truly the alternative perspectives that were sought, and each of these chapters has provided a different and deeply insightful discussion of the economic circumstances we have had to deal with over the period since the GFC began.

I am also especially grateful once again to Edward Elgar for his personal support for this project. I am also grateful for the highly professional group at Edward Elgar Publishing for their assistance in seeing this through to its final completion.

But it is to my family that I owe a special measure of gratitude and in this I include my now adult children Benjamin and Joshua. The book is, however, dedicated to my wife, Zuzanna, whose contribution has been her warm encouragement in allowing me the time to see this through to the end. My debts to her, as I have said before, extend far beyond her help in seeing this book finally into print.
