Acknowledgments

I never expected to write a book on Odious Debts. A truly serendipitous journey, I am indebted to so many for making it happen.

First and foremost, this project would never have been but for the Rotary World Peace Fellowship. I am so grateful and honored to have been part of this remarkable program, which took me from investment banking in London to Berkeley, California and gave me the opportunity to explore scholarship and to meet great people. Thank you to every single Rotarian around the world who contributes to the World Peace Fellowship. It is an amazing program and it is making a difference. From the Rotary family, special thanks to the godfather: Edwin Epstein, to Pate and Judy Thompson, Lily and Greg Freitas, and Bruce Campbell. Thank you for going above and beyond, for being interested, reading earlier drafts, for your friendship, for the meals, for making the Bay Area a welcoming home. Big thanks also to all the peace fellows scattered around the world, especially those whom I had the privilege to study and learn with. Peace is possible.

I also owe a huge debt to the special women from the Soroptimist Founder Region Foundation who gifted me with a doctoral dissertation scholarship. Thank you for your generosity and for your efforts in advancing the status of women.

From Berkeley there are way too many people to thank. While I was officially part of the Law School, I was lucky enough to receive supervision and critical feedback from scholars in other departments such as the Business School, Political Science, Geography, Economics, and Peace and Conflict Studies. UC Berkeley is without doubt one of the most inspirational places I have ever been. There is something in the water at Berkeley that makes most everyone and everything there just exceptional, just that perfect touch of cool. Thank you Berkeley. Thanks in particular to my supervisor, Robert Cooter, who continues to provide advice and guidance long after my graduation. Thank you also to John Yoo, Oona Hathaway, Richard Buxbaum, Cymi Payne, David Caron, Andrew Guzman, Daniel Rubinfeld, Stanley Lubman and Anthony Zaloom, all of whom I had the benefit of learning from while at Berkeley Law School. To Dariush Zahedi and Michael Watts: thank you for the thought-provoking peace seminars. To Robert Powell and Peter Lorentzen from Political Science: thank you for sharing with me the joys of game theory.

ix
The large white building on the hill by the law school in Berkeley also played a special part in this project. I-House, as it’s known to its residents, is a unique institution which brings together hundreds of scholars from around the world to share ideas and simply live together. It was in the dining hall and walkways of I-House that I engaged with lawyers, biochemists, sociologists, physicists, architects, and linguists to name a few, from every corner of the globe on a range of topics including odious debt. My work would have been less without the benefit of these conversations. I especially want to thank Jan Oster, Ashwin Van-Rooijen, Marise Hosomi, April Chen, Francesca Bordin, Theocharis Grigoriadis, Akasemi Newsome, and Emilio Martinez de Velasco for sharing the Berkeley experience, for willingly discussing odious debt at all times of the day and night, and for friendship.

Moving from the Bay Area across the Pacific to UNSW, I am greatly indebted to the faculty and student body at UNSW Law School for such a pleasant welcome back to Australia, and for providing the perfect space for me to complete this project. Thank you in particular to Ross Buckley, Justin O’Brien, Brendan Edgeworth and David Dixon for facilitating my transition from student to faculty, for valuing my research, and for creating a stimulating and collegial environment in which to work. I am so glad to be part of this wonderful Law School. Thank you also to Anna Lee and Tiffany Yeung for excellent research assistance.

I am further indebted to Matthew Wingeter from Cleary Gottlieb and Justin Alexander from Jubilee Iraq, for taking the time to talk numbers, for providing valuable data, and for being outstanding sounding boards. Thank you too to David Johnson, CEO extraordinaire from Stanford, Philip Harvey from Mallesons, and Christine Papas from Bronte Beach, for reading through numerous drafts and for helpful feedback. James Hodgson, thank you for your creative mind and superb cover design. And thank you to the Bikram Yoga studios at Polk St in San Francisco and Darlinghurst in Sydney for forcing me to lock the knee, and to develop the mental strength and discipline necessary to complete this project.

Finally, my biggest debt is to my family: to my parents Francis Wong and Margaret Wong who taught me to read, write and strive, and to my siblings Wini Wong and Allan Wong who I continue to learn with and from. Thank you for your continual support. While I may be at times odious, my debts to you will never be.

Sydney, February 2012