Writing a book is not the kind of work that ends at a certain time of the day. As the writer becomes more involved in the subjects of his (or her) book they become more like companions to him. Thus, at least in my experience (and as testified by other authors) the writer may find himself ‘talking with his topics’ while driving, eating, watching TV and even while conversing with other people. Briefly he may easily become intolerable to those around him. Therefore I want first of all to thank my family for being so patient with me while I was totally absorbed in writing.

I also wish to thank wholeheartedly the people who read complete or partial drafts of the manuscript or subjected themselves to interrogation concerning parts of the book. Thanks are due to my sister Naomi for separating the wheat from the chaff, and to my close friends Buzzy and Gingie, Gali Raz, Karin Amit, Gadi Amir, Eliav Zakai, Elly Hilman and Noa Viener – all of them friends and partners in various leadership projects.

I am grateful to some ‘normal members of society’ who are neither leadership scholars nor are they involved in the subject in any way, yet they patiently suffered my annoying behaviour while I was writing the book (abroad on a sabbatical) and volunteered – out of interest or politeness – to read drafts of the manuscript. At all events their remarks, based on personal experience of leadership or on common sense, were extremely helpful. Thank you, Dan Gelbart, Geoffrey Druker, Amichai Gilad and Yakov Shteif.

Naturally I was influenced not only by the people I spoke with but also by the ideas and research of other writers, as indicated by the many references in the book to various sources. But there are some writers who had more impact on the basic approach, on the core ideas, and I feel the need to thank these writers separately. Barry Schwartz’s books on Lincoln and Washington opened my eyes to the centrality of psychosociological processes in constructing leadership concepts. Reading Schwartz’s book on Lincoln was in fact the first stimulus that led me to jot down ideas that reached fruition some years later. Ian Kershaw’s books on Hitler and James MacGregor Burns’s book on leadership helped to deepen my understanding of the psychology of followers – the cornerstone of this book. Anita Shapira’s works on identity helped me a great deal in clarifying starting positions from which to address this complex subject with its abundant psychological literature. In particular I was impressed by the works of the social psychologists Boas Shamir, Hazel Markus and Steve Heine, and the sociologists Emile Durkheim, Charles Lindholm and Herbert Blumer. In addition, I was profoundly impressed by the work of Manfred Kets de Vries and Vamik Volkan, dealing with unconscious processes that are relevant to followers' attraction to leaders.

Focusing on the psychology of followers, the book features some well-known historical examples to illustrate various theories and arguments. However, it is not restricted to famous cases but also deals with leadership in everyday life – in organizations, in communities, in daily social contexts. Here I found the conceptualizations of Henry Mintzberg and Karl Weick most helpful. In the sphere of leadership in organizations, one cannot but be influenced by the monumental work of Bernard Bass and his diligent and prolific student Bruce Avolio. To all of these I am eternally grateful.

And finally, special thanks to Hazel Arieli, the editor and translator of all my books and a large part of my other academic works. Hazel has worked with me for many years and the phrase 'my right hand' is an understatement. I can't imagine what it would be like to work without her. Thank you.
