Preface

Our journey to the ultimate destination of publication of this book involved several significant steps. First of all, Ann and John enthusiastically accepted Marilyn’s invitation to discuss her concept of a legal inter-disciplinary approach to business innovation; and the genesis of this book arose from our plan for collaborative work on business innovation and law, starting with a conference. Next, we received the support of the Faculty of Law, Monash University in the form of a conference grant and so were able to start planning the conference. Then, as indicated in our chapter 1, this conference, held over three days in May 2011, provided the springboard for this book, enabling the authors to come together to present their papers on business innovation and further discuss the areas from the inter-disciplinary perspectives of intellectual property, labour and employment law and competition and corporate laws. Finally, we were very pleased to secure a book contract with Edward Elgar Publishing.

A book such as this, built upon and substantially developed from a diverse and multi-disciplinary range of papers presented at an international conference, requires whole-hearted commitment and support from many people. We wish to record our gratitude to those people and a number of organisations involved in the publication of this book.

We thank the Faculty of Law, Monash University for its financial support for the conference as well as the small research grant we were awarded to assist with editing. Our marketing and finance sections provided expert assistance for essential aspects of the conference. We are grateful to our conference administrator, Dr Ellen Berah of The Conference Organiser, for her efficient and enthusiastic administration of the conference and for being on the ground at the Monash University Centre, Prato, Italy to undertake the day-to-day running of the conference. The staff at the Monash University Prato Centre cheerfully supported and accommodated our conference needs, and we thank them, in particular Cathy Crupi and the then Director of the Centre, Dr Loretta Baldassar.

The book would not be possible without the authors who have contributed their chapters. They readily accepted our invitations to present their research on this new legal inter-disciplinary perspective in the conference forum; and again they were keen to write and contribute their chapters to this book. They have contributed in so many ways, both scholarly and personal. Many of them have now become our friends, a friendship that goes across international borders and which we value.

Michael Adams undertook editing assistance for us in relation to the chapters. We thank him for that assistance and for continuing to help us (after business hours) once he had commenced full-time employment.

We are grateful to our international publisher, Edward Elgar Publishing and its staff, especially John-Paul McDonald. They have been nothing but professional, helpful and supportive in their dealings with us for which we thank them.

That the conference exploring the legal field of research in this book—innovation and invention—was held in Italy was fitting too, as many great inventions and innovations have emanated from inventors in that country—from Da Vinci to Marconi and beyond.

Professor Marilyn Pittard
Professor Ann L. Monotti
Associate Professor John Duns
Faculty of Law, Monash University
Clayton, Australia
June 2012