This book emerged from looking around at the various resource models and trying to understand ways in which access and benefit-sharing might be illuminated as a working and workable concept. This is important because the mechanisms of access and benefit-sharing impose costs, often proportionately high costs, that might be better spent on conservation and research. Over time this project has been generously supported by the Australian Centre for Intellectual Property in Agriculture and the Australian Research Council (DP120101434). Most importantly, however, have been the discussions, challenges and insights from my colleagues. In particular I thank Brad Sherman, Catherine Pickering, Matthew Rimmer, Stephen Hubicki, Susan Downing, Leanne Wiseman, Jay Sanderson, Ralf Buckley, Kieran Tranter, Carol Ballard and Mark Brady.
