I would like to thank Mr Edward Elgar for inviting me to write this book. He went to Beijing in May 2011, meeting me at the National School of Development, Peking University, discussing my plan for this book. To my surprise, he came, without any assistant accompanying him, from another school to my office, a 15-minute walk, with a large bag of papers and books. After discussing the writing plan, we walked along the Weiming Lake, talking about the construction and history of Peking University. At an entrance to the university I found a taxi for Edward, but the driver refused to carry him, probably because he cannot speak Chinese. After a while, we finally found a taxi that would take him to his hotel. Ironically, this was the origin of this book. We will further discuss taxi drivers refusing to drive or selecting customers in Chinese cities in Chapter 8.

I could not have finished this book without the help of my daughter, Lisa Zhang, who did a close-read edit of my first drafts. I would like to thank my research assistants, Yunlei Qi and Junxiao Bu of Peking University, for their excellent information collecting and model building. I would also like to thank Emily Mew, Laura Mann, Victoria Nicols, Madhubanti Bhattacharyya, and Emma Griibon from Edward Elgar Publishing, for helping me to improve the text. Finally, my greatest debt is to my wife, Yuping Li, who always supports my work, especially during the hot days in the summer of 2013 when I was finishing this book.
