

Acknowledgements

I am grateful to a number of people without whom this book would never have been written.

Thanks are due to Professor Nick Pearce and Professor Gillian Doyle in the School of Culture and Creative Arts at Glasgow University who assisted me in many tangible ways and offered their encouragement. Professor David Carey Miller conducted many discussions and teaching sessions with me. He offered numerous suggestions for the improvement of the text. He offered mentorship, friendship and co-authorship of the article on which Chapter 5 is based. He was also instrumental in the appointment of research assistant Nadine Burrath, a Master of Laws graduate. She offered enthusiastic and high-quality research support.

Two groups of people deserve a special word of thanks. First, the staff of UNIDROIT, and specifically Frédérique Mestre, Bettina Maxion and Marina Schneider extended their help to me in 2012. Secondly, the first intake of students on the Art Law and Business MSc Programme run by Christie's Education in conjunction with the University of Glasgow (2013–2014) proved to be a remarkable and rich testing ground for many of the ideas contained in the book.

I am grateful to Professor Sophia Tang who assisted me in many different ways at the inception of this project. Mariki Rudolph offered her unstinting support throughout its completion. Edward Elgar staff and an anonymous reviewer also deserve my gratitude.

The encouragement of loved ones and friends has made all the difference. I owe you a great debt of thanks.

The research was concluded on 31 July 2014. All errors that remain in the text are mine alone.
