Acknowledgments

I must give thanks to the friends, colleagues, and teachers that have contributed to my formation as a student and scholar. From Colorado College, I thank Jeff Livesay and Jonathan Lee for their friendship and tutelage. As an undergraduate, they encouraged me to be creative and think beyond the bounds of any specific discipline. I have applied this philosophy throughout my graduate study, academic, and teaching career. This book is an example of such liberal learning. At Michigan State University, I had very fine teachers including Mohamed Ayoob and Michael Colaresi who taught me about international relations, and Steven Kautz, Arthur Melzer, and Jerry Weinberger, who molded my thought, introduced me to the beauty of close reading, and, through example, taught me how to teach.

Special thanks go to Michael Colaresi, Arthur Melzer, and Richard Zinman who each read and commented on earlier versions of individual chapters. I am indebted to Steven Kautz who read earlier versions of most of the chapters and provided helpful criticism. I would like to thank Mark Garner and Lorena Zapata for their invaluable assistance as graduate assistants in the preparation of the manuscript. Many thanks goes to my colleagues, especially Frances Bernat, Thomas Mitchell, and Stephen Duffy at Texas A&M International University who have provided great support and advice through all the phases of writing the manuscript.

Many thanks go to the faculty at the Jepson School of Leadership, including Gary L. McDowell, Sandra J. Peart, Terry L. Price, Thad Williamson, and J. Thomas Wren, for recognizing the value of my ideas for the study of leadership. I am especially grateful to Joanne Ciulla who encouraged me to write this book and included it in her series. Alan Sturmer, Jennifer Wilcox, and Bob Pickens and the rest of the topnotch team at Edward Elgar were the book's shepherds and made the experience an easy and pleasant one for its writer.

I must thank my wife Kary who shared her perceptive criticism and helped me clarify and improve the whole manuscript. Without her love, support, and patience I could not have completed this project. Lastly, I owe gratitude to my parents Victor and Frances for if it wasn't for them I wouldn't be the man I am today. I dedicate this book to them.

Parts of Chapters of 6 and 7 appear in an article that was previously published in Leadership, Accountability, and Ethics by the North American Business Press. I thank the Press for permission to incorporate that article into two more extensive chapters.

Mark A. Menaldo