This book is the product of many people who gave up their time and provided advice, assistance and much hospitality over almost ten years. When I began this project, I never imagined that I would conduct more than 160 interviews in five countries to piece together personal stories of relocation and adjustment.

The research conducted in Italy could not have been completed without the assistance of David Petrie of the Association for the Defence of Foreign Lecturers in Verona, John Young in Milan and Linda Lappin and Kim Manzi in Orta and Viterbo. These lettori welcomed me into their homes and shared their pioneering tales of intra-European mobility and the many disappointments they faced. I owe a particular debt to David for inviting me to Verona in 1995. I was a doctoral student and had just stumbled across the lettori problem during a conversation with Hugh McMahon, MEP in the European Parliament. For almost 20 years I have followed David’s struggles and indefatigable commitment to achieve justice for lettori.

The research on the Spanish doctors in England was assisted by my former student, Shannon Nutting, who travelled to Madrid and conducted interviews on my behalf. I am also grateful to Lissa Perteghella and Victoria Rubini of the British Embassy Madrid and to the doctors, National Health Service and Department of Health staff who agreed to be interviewed in County Durham. I am especially grateful to Dr. José Garcia Miralles, who was instrumental in providing access to research participants in the UK.

In Russia, I must thank Galina Nowopaschina, without whom this research project would never have got off the ground and who offered contacts, planned meetings and provided interpretation and delightful company during my visit. I would also like to express appreciation to the members of Nelegal and the Moscow Helsinki Group, as well as several activists who provided information and assistance in support of this research project. Dmitry Valenty at the British Council and Dr. Alexander Routchine at Moscow University for the Humanities also provided logistical support and welcomed me to Moscow.

The research in Croatia was facilitated with the assistance of several organizations and individuals. I would like to express my appreciation to the former OCSE and UNCHR staff in Zagreb, Sisak, Knin and Vukovar; Croatian government officials; and several human rights defenders, including Tin Gazivoda in Zagreb; Ljubomir Mikić of the Centre for Peace, Legal Advice and Psychosocial Assistance in Vukovar; and Charles Tauber and his colleague Sasha of The Coalition For Work With Psychotrauma and Peace, also in Vukovar. I am also grateful to former OSCE staff Anton Hristov, Jeroen Jansen, Olga Roberts, Momir Vukmirović, Jasmin Mahmić and to my superb interpreter, Sandra Popović.

My colleagues in Slovenia have been among the most welcoming any researcher could wish for. I am especially grateful to Jelka Zorn for her friendship, advice and tireless work on the erasure and to Neža Kogovšek Šalamon, another remarkable defender of human rights. These two women and their colleagues at the Peace Institute set me on course for what has become a defining project in my career and one which has opened the door to many subsequent studies. I must also record my appreciation to members of the Association of the Erased for their interest in this study and willingness to participate in it. I owe a particular debt to Matevž Krivic and Jasminca Dedič, who connected me to many of the research participants, helped to arrange interviews and offered much useful information. Admir Baltic and Drazena Peric acted as my superb interpreters and also provided translation of key documents. Colleagues in the research and the human rights communities also informed my visits and provided me with a wealth of interesting material. I thank Borut Grgic, Miran Komac, Igor Mekina, Aldo Milohnić, Boris Novak, Neva Miklavčič Predan and Mitja Zagar for spending many hours briefing me on Slovenian domestic politics.

Several friends and colleagues reviewed early versions of the case studies in this book and commented on presentations and previous articles. Others provided a keen ear as I batted ideas across. I am grateful to Othon Anastasakis, Barrie Axford, Richard Black, Adam Blitz, Maurizio Carbone, Joshua Castellino, Daniele Conversi, Anastasia Christou, Tom Cushman, John Eade, Matthew Gibney, Judith Glover, John Gold, Annie Hughes, Linda Kerber, Eleonore Kofman, Maureen Lynch, Jim Newell, Kalypso Nicolaïdis, Peter Nyers, Margaret Okole, Miguel Otero-Iglesias, Judith Pallot, Laurent Pech, Magnus Ryner, Rosemary Sales, Caroline Sawyer, Nigel Walford, Helena Wray and Roger Zetter. Colleagues at the Centre for the Study of Migration and Social Care at the University of Kent; Centre for the Study of Global Governance at the London School of Economics; and associates at South East European Studies at Oxford (SEESOX) and the Centre for Migration Policy and Society at the University of Oxford also provided insightful comments on earlier versions of some of the chapters. In addition, I benefited from presenting this work to the European Council Working Group on the Western Balkans (COWEB) in Brussels. Former research assistants Dan Ozarow and Donna Sherrington provided great help and directed me to new material which informed this study and I think made it considerably better.

I also received funding and assistance from several universities, the support of which was essential to this project. I wish to record my appreciation to Roehampton University, Oxford Brookes University, Kingston University, Middlesex University and the Refugee Studies Centre, University of Oxford.

The editorial team at Edward Elgar, Tim Williams, Emily Mew and John-Paul McDonald, have been a delight to work with and were more than indulgent as I underestimated just how long it would take to pull this project together. I am most appreciative to them, and to Edward Elgar, which continues to produce such engaging books. In addition, I should record a special note of thanks to Tempa Lautze and Diane Wardle, who read and re-read every chapter of this book and provided invaluable editorial assistance.
Finally, there are some other people without whom – or in spite of whom – this book would never have been written. Gail and David, Dawn and Michael, took more than a parental interest in my work and have, in different ways, been among my most enthusiastic cheerleaders. My wife Hayley braved the Russian winter, endured personal illness, sudden car failure and tolerated my absences on many occasions, all in the name of academic research. It was Hayley who initially led me to some of the most exciting case studies following a review of an article in the Financial Times, and my research has benefited from her support in countless ways. She has been the most consistent source of encouragement and insight over the past 12 years and it has been great fun investigating the world with her. And finally, to Romilly, the little girl who saw Daddy sitting at the computer, endlessly typing away, and for whom the world is one big discovery. Romilly has been the most wonderful distraction throughout the course of this project and it is to her that this book is dedicated with love.
