This monograph has been the culmination of a couple of years' empirical work and thanks must go to the University of the West of England for providing funding for the project. The funding has allowed an under-researched area to be explored in a new and innovative manner. The risk of cybercrime and economic Internet crime are as real and present as everyday physical financial crime. Only when there is full acceptance and awareness of these types of cybercrimes will it be possible for cyber-criminals to be tackled effectively.

Thanks must also go to my research assistant, Henry Hillman, who has gone above and beyond the call of duty in his work on this project. His diligence and painstaking analysis of the games considered in this research are to be applauded. Henry's influence on this book is clearly apparent and it has been a pleasure working with him over the last couple of years.

A further big thank you must go to my Mum, Jill Chambers, for proofreading my work and spending time understanding the many abstract concepts I have introduced during our discussions about the research. Her continued support and love is overwhelming and without it I would not be able to continue my research. Thanks also to my Dad, Chris Chambers, and husband, Bruce Jones, whose support and love I could not be without.
