Acknowledgements

I gratefully acknowledge the contribution made by a number of people and organisations. Without them the completion of this book would not have been possible. First and foremost, my supervisor Knut Blind provided tremendous support and shaped my way of thinking in a way that made me always question conventional wisdom. Furthermore, I thank my colleagues at the Chair of Innovation Economics, Technische Universität Berlin, where this doctoral thesis was submitted, for their unfailing advice and support. Particular thanks are due to Peter Neuhäusler, who contributed substantially to important parts of this book.

I was fortunate to spend two years as a doctoral student at the Max Planck Institute for Intellectual Property and Competition Law, where I received a great deal of support, especially from Reto M. Hilty and Frank Müller-Langer. I was equally fortunate to spend the final year of my doctoral studies at the Oxford Intellectual Property Research Centre, University of Oxford, which allowed me to gather ideas from various disciplines. I am most grateful to Robert Pitkethly, Graeme Dinwoodie, Christine Greenhalgh and Dan Awrey for the invaluable feedback and support they have given me.

Throughout my doctoral studies my research benefited from the vast experience of Alexander Wurzer and Stephan Hundertmark – I learned a great deal from them. Moreover, the completion of this book would not have been possible without the time and effort of the many survey respondents and the participation of my interview partners. Finally, the greatest contribution was made by my family and friends. It is to my parents that this book is dedicated.
