This book is the final result of a long and inspiring research process, during which I have collected many experiences and met several people who helped and encouraged me to discover the richness and potentialities of this topic.

My interest in non-governmental organisations (NGOs) and global politics fitted coherently into the academic environment in which I have the chance to work, but was also nurtured through my involvement as a member of St Joan's Alliance, an international NGO that seeks to ensure that the equality of rights between women and men is recognised in all fields and on all continents.

Representing this cause at the United Nations (UN) – during some conferences in Geneva – provided me with a unique opportunity to test my academic knowledge and confront civil-society activism.

I started reflecting on this work while I was a Fellow at the Department of Politics and International Relations of the University of Delaware, and finished by revising some of the chapters during my stay, as a Visiting Fellow, at the Department of Sociology of the University of Oxford. Conversations with Mark Miller, Robert Denmark, Jan Zielonka, Jennifer Welsh and Hugo Slim allowed me to shape and further consolidate my reflections and assumptions.

During the years, I have participated in many conferences and have had the chance to receive a wide variety of relevant feedback to my papers presenting preliminary and tentative assumptions on the topic. Among those scholars who discussed my work, during panels or within network activities, I would like to mention Stefan Wolff, David Galbreath, Tatyana Malyarenko, Alistair Shepherd, Joseph Rudolph, Conor Galvin, Petia Guerguieva, Roberto Belloni, Liborio Mattina, Ana Devic, Maria A. Sabiote, Raffaele Marchetti, Stelios Stavridis and Szlatko Sabic.

The preparation and management of the interviews with NGO representatives was a challenging and extremely exciting step forward. Time spent in Geneva and Brussels, in the autumn of 2009, allowed me to complete the research by reflecting on the more practical implications of humanitarian tasks. I am indebted to all those people who, despite their busy schedules, agreed to meet me and reply to my questions. I would like to thank Srdjan Cvijic, Christian Herbette, John King, Pascal Daudin, Stefano Piziali, Antje Herrberg, Geoffrey Timmermans, Dominic Crowley, Ian Mansfield, Ben Moore, Flore Brennan, Tijana Dmitrovic, Alanna Ryan, Ed Schenkenberg, Koenraad Van Brabant, Philippe Bartholmé, Floris Faber, Emmanuel Tronc, Alessandro Rossi, Noah Gottschalk, Fr Paul Lansu, Maria Mercedes Rossi, Kerry Smith, Abou Fassi-Fihri, Mustafa Omar, Julie Crespin, Salvatore Parata, Kathrin Schick and Wayne Bleier.

Also, I am grateful to Carla Ricci and H el ene Durand-Ballivet for facilitating my stay and for providing concrete information on NGOs, and to Mario Telo and Sven Biscop for introducing me respectively at the Universit e Libre Bruxelles and the Egmont Institute, and for offering the proper academic environment for making the survey.

Special thanks are due to Joseph Grieco for rationalising the book project and discussing its method and structure.

I am also very grateful to the anonymous referees for giving me some extremely useful suggestions for making the book even more attractive within academia and the market, and to Victoria Straker for editing chapters and revising the language.

Last, but certainly not least, I owe a debt of recognition to the group of scholars with whom I always work: Francesca Longo, Stefania Panebianco, Carla Montelone and Rosa Rossi.

Above all, I am very grateful to Fulvio Attin a for always being at my side during the research, discussing and suggesting every single aspect of this book, and, moreover, for always supporting me with his knowledge, reliability and endurance.

The responsibility for what is written in this book is entirely mine.

This book is dedicated to my family, who usually help me to put things in the right perspective.
