

About the authors

Geir Hønneland has studied Russian fisheries management, and the Norwegian-Russian interface in the management of the Barents Sea fish resources, for nearly two decades. His work builds on participant observation in the Norwegian Coast Guard and the Joint Norwegian-Russian Fisheries Commission, as well as interviews with actors in the Russian fishing industry.

Anna Korppoo has been working on Russian climate change policies and politics at the international and domestic level since 2000. She has followed Russia's role in the international climate negotiations as an observer and the implementation of the Kyoto mechanisms in transition economies. She has published several policy advice briefs as well as more academic works.

Nina Tynkkynen has studied Russian participation in international environmental politics, especially the politics of the Baltic Sea protection, since the early 2000s. She has published widely on Russian environmental policy and international environmental politics.
