This book is partially based on a comparative research project undertaken by the Bogazici University research center Social Policy Forum and FASOPO (Fonds d'Analyse des Sociétés Politiques) on the changing business environments of Turkey and Morocco. Our working title for the comparative project was “Islamic Entrepreneurs in Morocco and Turkey.” However, what we observed in the field was less the mark of religious identity on how certain economic actors conducted business than the overall economic and sociopolitical changes in these two societies that were reflected in the alliances, conflicts and forms of interest representation in business life. The joint project has thus inspired us to approach the political and cultural context of the Turkish business environment as an area where we could trace the transformations alongside the historical legacy of Turkish modernization in the republican period and under the impact of economic globalization. The outcome was a case study that we hope will contribute to attempts to understand the nature of the global capitalism of the last four decades. We are grateful to Bogazici University for providing us with a wonderful research environment and ongoing logistical support during the whole project. We would also like to thank the Agence Française de Développement (l’AFED) for providing the financial support that enabled our fruitful collaboration with FASOPO.

The book was written when Ayşe Buğra was a fellow at the Wissenschaftskolleg zu Berlin and Osman Savaşkan was at Harvard University as a visiting research associate. Ayşe Buğra feels indebted to all those who make the Wissenschaftskolleg a uniquely special place for academic work. Osman Savaşkan wishes to thank the Center for International Development at the John F. Kennedy School of Government for providing immense opportunities for access to research facilities and substantive feedback from the academic community.
