In this text I am concerned with government finances and the capacity of nation-states to balance historically grown cultural, political and economic diversity, all reflected in their degree of decentralization, with the desire to reach and keep macroeconomic stability. My main point is that we should aim for a more comprehensive perspective on stability in fiscally decentralized schemes, including the message that changing fiscal rules at the central government level might send to politicians at all levels of government. Over the course of writing and completing this book, I have acquired a number of significant debts. Many people have contributed to the success of this project. This book would not have been possible, however, without the willingness of my interview partners in Latin America to share their past crisis experience. Interviews with policy makers and economists from four countries (Argentina, Brazil, Ecuador and Uruguay) were invaluable to my understanding of economic policy making in the context of emerging markets. Talking to country experts at international institutions and private sector representatives in New York and Washington, DC further added to that understanding. I thank them all for their openness to my project. The book at hand presents work written at the Freie Universität Berlin and the Hertie School of Governance, and then completed during research stays at Princeton and Harvard Universities, continuing into my first academic position as visiting assistant professor at the Central European University Budapest. I thank Alex Pettifer and his team at Edward Elgar Publishing for their support and patience during the completion of the manuscript.
Many people at these institutions offered help and advice, and I thank them all for their time and effort. All of the remaining errors are, of course, to be considered entirely my own.

I am also grateful for financial support for the research that led to this book. This was provided by the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft under the research center ‘Governance in Areas of Limited Statehood’ (SFB 700). As a member of the research center, under the directorship of Thomas Risse and Ursula Lehmkuhl at the Freie Universität Berlin, I benefitted greatly from the intellectual environment and the administrative and financial support. I am also grateful for financial support from the German Academic Exchange Service (DAAD) and the Berlin Consortium for German Studies (BCGS) together with Princeton University. The Thyssen Foundation generously supported my research at Harvard University's Weatherhead Center for International Affairs through the Transatlantic Fellowship Initiative. At Harvard, I would like to thank Steve Bloomfield, the managing director of the Weatherhead Center for International Affairs, and also his staff for their untiring support. I am indebted to Karl Kaiser, longtime director of Harvard University's Program on Transatlantic Relations, for his help and guidance.

Without question, the most sustained debt is to Henrik Enderlein and Mark Hallerberg at the Hertie School of Governance in Berlin. As professor and academic advisor, Henrik had inspired me at an early stage of my academic career to work on topics in international political economy. To this day, Henrik continues to be a source of inspiration in so many ways and I consider myself very lucky to have had an opportunity to work alongside him for several years in his project on sovereign debt crises in emerging market economies. Mark Hallerberg agreed to become my second advisor almost the moment he arrived as professor at the Hertie School, and has served as an incredible source of intellectual inspiration, academic guidance and support to me. As a graduate student in Berlin, I benefitted from the exchange with many colleagues at the Hertie School and at the Freie Universität, in particular Christoph Trebesch from whom I have learned a great deal. I am deeply grateful also to two outstanding professors at the Freie Universität Berlin; to Tanja Börzel for her guidance and to Susanne Lütz for providing helpful academic advice. Many thanks also to Thomas Eimer.

Outside Berlin's educational institutions, I was strongly supported by a number of extraordinary people. At Princeton University, Dani Campello provided important help, reading and commenting extensively on my work. Robert Keohane and Helen Milner both provided crucial comments and pointed me to interesting historical cases. I am also grateful for the helpful comments and suggestions I received from members of Princeton University's Comparative Politics Seminar and Harvard University's Political Economy Seminar. At Harvard University, I am indebted to Jeffry Frieden for offering his invaluable academic advice and help in getting me in touch with other scholars in the Harvard community. Several colleagues stood ready to read my work and provide invaluable comments, including Gabi Spilker, Joachim Wehner, Daniel Mütge, Fabio Wasserfallen and Jorge I. Domínguez. Gabi, together with Mareike Kleine and Cornelia Woll, also turned out to be an impeccable source of moral support during the final writing phase of the manuscript. I am deeply grateful for their help. But I am also grateful for crucial support at the early stages of my research project. Pablo Pinto, who was my professor of political economy at Columbia University, provided me with important contacts in Argentina. Many thanks also to Daniela Ayoso and Vincente Albornoz for sharing valuable contacts with policy makers in Ecuador. I thank Caroline Silva-Garbade for lavishly sharing her contacts with crucial interview partners in Argentina and Brazil and for engaging me in inspiring discussions about (failed) economic policies for Latin America.

Over the course of writing this book, I was lucky to receive support from several dear friends and family. I thank Antje von Daniels for letting me draw on her creative mind, elevating my poor drawings to a much higher graphic level. Maria Ziegler and Michael Peters have been true friends and inexhaustible sources of fine advice. I am deeply thankful to Céline Küsters for being there, always and unconditionally. Also to Julia-Hannah Stahl and Lisa Julie Rauen for their cheering up when I needed it most. I am also deeply grateful to Britta Fischer and Herb Fox and their wonderful and inspiring family. I could always count on their help and moral support.

This book is dedicated to my father because I know that no one else would have been prouder to hold these pages in his hands. However, I feel greatly indebted to my whole family – the one I was born into as much as those who so generously accepted me as one of their own. Without the loving support and patience of my mother-in-law and father-in-law, this endeavor would hardly have been possible. Certainly, life would have been much less enjoyable. In the writing of the chapters of this book, many events, but more importantly people, were moving my life. Four of them are the most fantastic gift that anyone could hope to have in their lives: Justus, Lucie, Romy, and Franz. Their love carries me always.
