‘This book provides an important contribution on the links between urban planning and other types of organizing work performed in the name of the ‘creative city’. Further, it also highlights the daunting challenges associated with attempting to realize highly ambitious ideals of decentralized co-creation, empowering a plethora of heterogeneous actors, in a manner that does not sell short democratic transparency and accountability.’

Jonathan Metzger, KTH Royal Institute of Technology, Sweden

‘A detailed, processual and ethnographic study of European Cities of Culture is overdue. This book fills an important gap in both scholarship and civic management. For any city authorities planning to bid for and stage future City of Culture programs it is an essential practical guide; for any researchers interested in the management of cities, those elusive, flexible objects of analysis, it will be an important contribution to their analytical toolbox. Lively and well researched, it is a must-read.’

Stewart Clegg, University of Technology Sydney, Australia

‘Organizing Cultural Capital events has become the contemporary equivalent of Tennessee Valley Authority: every city wants to do it, and prescriptions how to do it proliferate. This book is unique in that it presents many different stories and points of view, providing a detailed description of everyday organizing, but also original theoretical insights together with useful practical recommendations.’

Barbara Czarniawska, University of Gothenburg, Sweden
