Acknowledgments

We begin by thanking Steven Ealy, Liberty Fund Fellow, who brought us together at a Liberty Fund colloquium. Steve recognized long ago the parallel nature, and we hope the complementary nature, of our thinking.

We owe Liberty Fund an enormous debt in that we have been able to participate in several hundred colloquia over several decades where we have had an opportunity to meet, learn from, and at times politely disagree with an extraordinary range of thinkers in many disciplines (the arts, classics, economics, history, literature, philosophy, political theory, religion, science, and so on). In retrospect, we realize that we have been part of an invisible university, a university in the true sense of the term. All this has been made possible by Charles King, William Dennis, Roseda D. Decker, Richard W. Duesenberg, Giancarlo Ibárgüen S., Joseph F. Johnston, Jr., Leonard P. Liggio, Mary A. O’Grady, Emilio J. Pacheco, Ben A. Rast, T. Alan Russell, Dane Starbuck, Chris L. Talley, Richard A. Ware, Douglas J. Den Uyl, Manuel Ayau, James F. Cote, G.M. Curtis, Hans L. Eicholz, Frederick J. Fransen, David M. Hart, G. Patrick Lynch, William P. Ruger, Sarah Skwire, Amy Willis, Mark Yellin, and Leonidas Zelmanovitz.

In 2011, we published The Two Narratives of Political Economy with Scrivener Press and Wiley. It was an anthology based on the same theme, namely, that Locke and Rousseau represent the two dominant and competing narratives in political economy. The anthology, with extensive introductions, ended with Marx and Engels. We were pleasantly surprised both by the success of the book and by the calls from scholarly users to expand the theme into the twentieth century and beyond. The present volume is an attempt to do so as a full length book and not as an anthology. We take this opportunity to thank Martin Scrivener not only for supporting the original publication but for giving us his blessing in incorporating those ideas into the present book.

We also want to thank APEE for holding a symposium on the original anthology, a symposium at which Jane Shaw, Randy Simmons, and Art Carden offered a highly gratifying and constructive critique. Roberta Herzberg and others who used the material in an early draft version provided us with additional useful comments.
Acknowledgments

During the Fall of 2015, Nicholas Capaldi conducted a small seminar using a draft version. Two students, Harrison Lempriere and John L. Rose gave him valuable feedback.

Last but not least we wish to thank our spouses, Nadia Nedzel and Angela Edwards, both because they have been our most severe critics and for the many hours of fruitful conversation on these topics.

Nicholas Capaldi and Gordon Lloyd