Acknowledgements

I have been fortunate to receive the help and advice of numerous people who made this book possible and helped to improve it. It is a pleasure to acknowledge them here. It is impossible to acknowledge everyone who had some kind of impact on the final product. I begin with an expression of gratitude to scholars for their patience and support over the course of this project.

This study of interfirm relationships in Japan reflects my long-standing interest in the historical evolution of the Japanese management system. Over the years, various embryonic ideas have been published and I have greatly benefited from the comments and advice they have elicited. I would like to thank everyone who has contributed to these. Moreover, I have tried out my ideas in seminars and conferences, where the comments of the participants have exercised great influence on the writing of this book. I greatly appreciate the feedback I have received from the audience over the years. I have also received tangible and intangible intellectual stimulation from many colleagues and friends, for which I am grateful.

I owe special thanks to Frank Giarratani for comments on a draft chapter. Hiromu Nagahara, Manami Suzuki, Eliko Kosaka and Donggi Choi have read the manuscript in its entirety. I would especially like to thank them.

I am deeply grateful for the patient and loving support of my family, including my wife, Sookhyeun, my son, Jaejoong and my daughter, Sohyun. No study would be possible to complete without the support of my family. Last but by no means least, my parents deserve special thanks for their continual support.

Finally, of course, I remain responsible for any errors of omission or commission.
