

Acknowledgments

Each essay began life as a research project, aimed at journal publication, as expected of tenure-track academics in the social sciences. Each of those research projects was conceived and conducted jointly with long-time colleagues, either Barbara J. Phillips, or Shelby McIntyre and Ravi Shanmugam, as noted on the title page for each essay. Placing their names on these title pages acknowledges my debt to them. None of these essays started with me alone. But by using the “with” formula to describe authorship, I absolve my colleagues of such howlers, pretention, or ignorance as may remain. They had no say over the versions of our ideas presented here, and cannot be blamed for whatever has gone awry.

I’d also like to acknowledge my editor at Edward Elgar Publishing, Alan Sturmer, for taking a chance on me. And finally, I’d like to acknowledge Santa Clara University for its generous retirement policies, which helped in making the career transition from journal publishing to book authorship. Santa Clara was a wonderful place to have spent 30 years in academia.
