This book emerges from a longstanding programme of research by Canada's International Development Research Centre into competition policy as an underappreciated yet very important instrument of economic development. Research funded through the IDRC programme was the basis for this book. Susan Joekes was the manager of the programme and Lahcen Achy a principal consultant and advisor. Rohinton Medhora, Brent Herbert-Copley, Andrès Rius and Arjan de Haan were particularly strong supporters of the programme and Julian Clarke and Miriam Ruscio helped greatly in programme delivery. The financial grants provided by IDRC were modest: its greater contribution may have been its ability to mobilise support for the researchers from international experts and to enable the researchers to engage with each other in a spirit of enquiry and in pursuit of good policies for development.

Our first acknowledgement is to the very many competition authorities around the world, too many to mention individually, which participated in the IDRC programme. They include but are not limited to those represented in this book. We appreciate that they all seized the opportunity to enhance understanding of their markets and to fine tune the drafting or the enforcement of their national competition laws.

Our second acknowledgement is to all those who generously facilitated and supported the implementation of the programme as trainers, expert advisers and proposal assessors. Among them we would like to mention Luis Abugattas, Allan Asher, Izak Atiyas, Nigel Caesar, Philip Evans, Simon Evenett, Elizabeth Farina, James Hodge, Peter Holmes, Frédéric Jenny, Eugenio Rivera, Khalid Sekkat and Taimoon Stewart.
