Lea Brilmayer owes a great debt to the students enrolled in her fall 2014 seminar on International Legal Theory, which addressed problems relating to international compensation commissions. The discussions in class and the paper drafts were invaluable contributions to an early version of her thinking about the subject. Among the students providing valuable research and writing were: Abigail Graber and Maeghan Mikorski (overview and historical precedents); Tara Davenport and Celso Perez Carballo (institutional advantages and disadvantages); Chris Nason (costs and funding); Karun Tilak (jurisdiction); Shlomit Stein (jurisdictional time frame); Gautam Bhatia (diplomatic representation); Kristine Beckerle (individual claims); Robert James (party structure); Rebecca Buckwalter Poza (evidence) and Shouvik Bhattacharya (remedies). She has also been fortunate to have spectacular research assistance by students at Yale. These include Daniel Hessel, Stephanie Krent, Jack Whitely, Erin Biel and Delbert Tran. She has been more fortunate, still, to have her husband Bill Horne, who is simply spectacular in all respects.

Dear friends: I owe you the experience of a lifetime, and an unusually fortunate one at that. H, your support and friendship carried me through thick and thin and there is no one like you. Y, you’ll never read this, so why bother with thanks (even though deserved)? C, you are an incomparable colleague and an intellectual challenger worthy of a professorship. I, the confidence that you placed in me changed my life. Nothing could mean more to me.

In 2002, Lorraine Charlton took a six-month sabbatical from her career as an international capital markets lawyer to work on a public international arbitration. Five years later, she returned to the international capital markets, but not without a deep appreciation for the community of people who work to bring stability, justice and peace to the aftermath of an armed conflict.

She will be forever grateful to Lea Brilmayer for offering that first opportunity to work on her team and for the increasing levels of trust placed in her and for the friendship offered over the years. Working with Lea and Chiara on this book has been every bit as interesting, challenging, and rewarding as expected – and then some! Ms. Charlton thanks both for their many helpful suggestions and encouragement. She also owes a particular debt to Pamela Fiwwoo, the Latham & Watkins law librarian who laid her hands on any book requested and kept the lending libraries at bay when all those books were well past their due dates.

Ms. Charlton also offers all her love to Amanda, Celia and Theo, who have received less attention than they deserved and gave her the time and solitude needed to get it done. Especially Amanda, who continues, after all these many years, to cheerfully make sure she never, ever puts two spaces after a period.

I am immensely grateful to Lea Brilmayer – for her generous, careful and fun mentorship for many years. Working on this book together is the cherry on top.

I am also grateful to Lea and to Lorraine for making writing this book such a rewarding, collaborative and enjoyable experience, and for their dedication to the project, for their suggestions, for keeping all the deadlines and for their sense of humor. You go girls!

At Richmond Law, I am grateful for the research assistance by Charles Davidson, Klementina Pavlova, Malcolm Savage, Cassandra Powell, Mahan Ashouri and Azar Mahmoudi. In addition, Samantha Fleming, Clay Campbell, Ally DeBoer and Caleb McCallum provided excellent editorial review. I would also like to thank two masterful librarians, Alexis Fetzer and Jason Zarin, for all their help.

Lastly, I owe an endless debt of gratitude to my husband Andre, and my children Alexander and Charlotte – eccò i miei gioielli. CG
