Acknowledgements

I wish to acknowledge the many individuals who have played a role, wittingly or unwittingly, in enabling this book to be written. These include: my postgraduate supervisor, Michael Dolan and my Dalhousie University mentor, Tim Shaw, for their unstinting support during and after my doctoral studies; the Eco-Research Chair in Environmental Law and Policy at the University of Victoria, Michael M’Gonigle, for taking me on as a Research Associate, supporting my postdoctoral fellowship application and co-editing Nature, Production, Power; Chris Tollefson of the University of Victoria Law School for introducing me to the theory and practice of governance; and Aynsley Kellow of the University of Tasmania for offering me the opportunity to live and work on one of the world’s most liveable islands.

I also acknowledge the influence of my graduate students, especially Simon Birrell, Dain Bolwell, Tim Cadman, Natasha Chassagne, Eve Croeser, Robin Krabbe, Carey Mather and Laura Ripoll-Gonzalez. Individually and collectively, they have ensured I read widely in diverse fields and challenged, often vigorously, some of my nascent ideas. Thanks are due too to many colleagues at the University of Tasmania, including those in the Institute for the Study of Social Change’s Sustainable Food Systems Flagship (Aidan Davison, Sandy Murray and Michelle Phillipov); the Discipline of Politics and International Relations (Marcus Haward and Joanna Vince); and the Paying Their Fair Share project (UTAS’s Richard Eccleston and Hannah Murphy-Gregory, and University of Sydney’s John Mikler and Ainsley Elbra). Especial thanks go to Kim Atkins, Nigel McKinlay and Gerwin Otte for comments on the manuscript’s final draft and to Elite Editing for an early and excellent copy-edit.

Most importantly, I would like to thank my family – my wife, life partner, blended learning manager and professional copy-editor, Beverly Goldfarb; and my son and theoretical physicist, Evan Goldfarb Gale. Both have been crucial sounding boards for the ideas put forward in the book, and their stated comments and confused looks have undoubtedly influenced the book’s explication and refinement of critical concepts and key relationships.

As author, I do of course take full responsibility for all errors of fact and interpretation, and beg the reader’s indulgence for any significant misconstruals and outright omissions.
