

Acknowledgments

Writing a book, although a sometime solitary effort, is never a solo one. Many people along the way, have contributed to this work. First, my family, particularly, my wonderful wife, forbore much. Second, I owe a great debt to the Jean and Blulette Nordmann Foundation, and to its trustees, Amb. Francois Nordmann, Claude Nordmann, and Isabelle Nordmann, for awarding me a Nordmann Fellowship. That stipend and their unending kindness and friendship afforded me both financial and moral support, as well as the determination, particularly during my stay in Fribourg, Switzerland, to consider the issues addressed in this book. It also provided me with the time and resources to conduct the preliminary and foundational research for this book.

In addition, I owe a note of thanks to the following, for various and fruitful discussions about water law, development, human rights, or dams: Robert “Bo” Abrams, who continually enhances my thinking regarding water law and its norms; Don Anton, a dear colleague and a magnificent environmental law advocate and scholar, who always brings up issues and questions that I miss or do not consider; Samantha Besson, who hosted me at the University of Fribourg’s Faculty of Law, as a member of the Board of the Jean and Blulette Nordmann Foundation for relations between the University of Freiburg and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and whose passion for human rights and public international law both invigorated and motivated me; Tomer Broude, a wonderful, energizing, and inspiring lawyer and teacher in whose development and law class this book began its germination; Alister Rieu-Clarke, whose multidisciplinary analysis of the risks and opportunities of dams has informed my thinking; Noah Hall, a wonderful colleague, whose expertise in environmental and water law, and his work on behalf of the preservation of the Great Lakes, has provided me with the fodder to contemplate water law in diverse vectors; Oliver A. Houck, an exceptional lawyer and my mentor; Richard Laster, friend, superb lawyer, thinker, and caring human being, whose work on behalf of the environment in Israel is legend; Stephen McCaffrey, a brilliant and forward-thinking water lawyer, whose writings on water law and collegiality have helped me view problems beyond the traditional perspective; Owen McIntyre, a brilliant lawyer and lecturer, who allowed me to bounce ideas off him; Oren Perez, a delightful and impressive intellectual; Dinah Shelton, who has informed my thinking on international human rights law and its vagaries; David Schorr, a wonderful colleague and consummate historian of environmental and water law, who has always afforded me the time to talk and pick his brain; Yuval Shany, a superb lawyer, thinker and human rights advocate; and last but certainly not least, A. Dan Tarlock, the Dean of American and International Water Law and International Environmental Law, whose scholarship, conversations – at various conferences where we have met – impressive insights, and humility have always illuminated my thinking.

I am also indebted to the following four authors, whose books were my polestar for this project.

- Amartya Sen, Development as Freedom (Alfred Knopf, New York, 1999). Sen was awarded the 1998 Nobel Prize for Economics;
- Arundhati Roy, The Cost of Living (The Modern Library, New York, 1999);
- George Kent, Freedom From Want: The Human Right to Adequate Food (Georgetown University Press, Washington D.C., 2005);
- Patrick McCully, Silenced Rivers: The Ecology and Politics of Large Dams (Zed Books, London, 2001).