Acknowledgments

For a slow worker like myself, a scholarly book takes so long to complete that one accumulates many, many helps along the way. Of course, all errors are my own, but without the kinds of support I acknowledge here, the book would have taken even longer to come to life.

First, I must thank the University of Delaware for the generous leave policy that it makes available to “named professors.” This policy provided invaluable time for research and reflection.

Next, I single out Michael Zuckert and Lee Epstein for very long ago having urged me to write a casebook on the civil rights of African-Americans; that task proved impossibly large so I wrote this instead. But without the nudge from each of them, perhaps not even this book would have come into being.

For feedback on my thoughts, for intellectual stimulation, for helpful suggestions, and in general, for making the life of an academic the pleasure that it is, I must gratefully acknowledge all of the following: Sanford Levinson, Mark Tushnet, Mark Graber, and Jack Balkin, each as individuals and also as organizers of the DC-Baltimore Schmooze; also all the participants in the many Schmoozes I attended and the several Liberty Fund meetings that I attended, whose names make too lengthy a list to itemize in full; also Pam Brandwein, Daniel Hoffman, Paul Finkelman, the late Kermit Hall, Jim Stoner, Peter Kolchin, Ann Boylan, Carole Marks, Paul Sracic, Daniel Guenther, Matthew Hall, Eric Segall, Marty Lederman, Jim Magee, Wayne Batchis, Sue Davis, Eileen McDonough, Howard Gillman, Ronny Kahn, and Carol Nackenoff.

I also thank Catherine Zuckert and the late David Ingersoll for praising my work, on occasion, in ways that deeply encouraged me. I thank my longtime colleague, Henry Reynolds for arguing with me consistently and capably against the institution of judicial review (I wonder if this book would change his mind). I thank my husband Phil for putting up with me all these years, serving as my techno guru in all things computer-related, and helping to keep me sane during my daily challenges at finding lost objects. I dedicate this book to my extended family members, Audrey, Chris, and Jackson, and to my good friend Alice Ba. To the extent that this book accomplishes anything toward improving life in America for the members of racial minorities, these are all people close to me who may reap some benefit.
The U.S. Supreme Court and racial minorities

Leslie F. Goldstein, Morris Professor Emerita of Political Science
University of Delaware