Acknowledgements

Any book is the outcome of a journey, one that is undertaken not only in the intellectual realm but also within the space of the deeply personal and intimate. It involves a conversation with the many, and one that has no real beginning and also never ends. It is an inquiry and process of reflection and engagement, the value of which rests in its ability to change us and teach us to think differently. The writing process is at some level a solitary one, but it cannot be sustained without the threads of people, personal relations and institutions that form the weave of one’s life. This book is stitched together by the many different threads that make up my life world.

I owe a special debt to a number of people for being so very encouraging and tireless interlocutors during the process of writing this book. My thanks to colleagues at Queen Mary University of London (QMUL), in particular, Elizabeth Barnes, Jessie Hohman, Penny Green, and Isobel Roele, for supporting, as well as engaging with, my work. I owe a special debt to Dianne Otto, whose input into the text has helped me reframe some of the central arguments in this book, and also to Smriti Vohra, for providing such incisive comments and bringing the gift of her scrutinizing eye to the manuscript as a whole. I am fortunate to be a part of the Institute for Global Law and Policy, Harvard Law School, which has provided me not only with a platform for sharing deeply provocative ideas, but also with colleagues who have been extremely generous with their time in discussing various aspects of my project and providing the most invaluable suggestions and insights during conversations had in this space: Karen Engle, Gunter Frankenburg, Vanja Hamzić, Adil Khan, Vasuki Neshiat, Ben Golder and David Kennedy.

I am especially grateful for the wonderful friendship and the many significant personal exchanges with Saba Mahmood, who passed away before the completion of this manuscript. Her scholarship initiated an intellectual revolution in the humanities and social sciences to think beyond the liberal imaginary and her ideas have been a major inspiration for this endeavour.

There are a host of institutions that have provided me with an intellectual home during the years that this book has been in gestation:
Acknowledgements

the International State Crime Initiative, School of Law, QMUL; Melbourne Law School, where my appointment as a Senior Fellow has provided me the opportunity to develop this project and receive unparalleled research support; the Symbiosis School of Law, Pune; and the Anthropology Department at the Graduate Institute for International and Development Studies, Geneva, with special thanks to Shalini Randeira and Isabelle Milbert for their support.

I am fortunate to have been afforded the opportunity to share my research with various audiences around the world. I am especially indebted to the Berlin Institute for Cultural Inquiry; the University of Berlin; the Centre for Human Rights, University of Copenhagen; the Centre for Law and Society in a Global Context, QMUL; the Faculty of Law and Social Sciences, School of Oriental and African Studies; the Department of Gender Studies, London School of Economics; the Department of Legal Philosophy and the Gender Research Centre, University of Vienna; the Department of Philosophy, North-Eastern Hill University, Shillong; the École de Droit, SciencePo, Paris; the Faculty of Law and the Gender Research Centre, Geneva University; the Gender Research Centre, Hong Kong University; the Indian Council of Philosophical Research, New Delhi; the Institute of Advanced Studies, Simla; Faculty of Law, Jamia Millia Ismalia University, New Delhi; the Institute of Global Law and Policy, Harvard Law School; Jindal Global Law School, Sonepat; the University of Potsdam; and the School of Law and the Centre for Postcolonial Studies, Goethe University, Frankfurt. Thanks to Sealing Cheng, Hilda Romer Christensen, Nikita Dhawan, Gunter Frankenburg, Gina Heathcote, Clare Hemmings, Lys Kulamadayil, Elisabeth Holzleithner, Sumi Madhok, Sushila Mesquita, Bérénice Schramm, and Angela Wong, for hosting various events at which I presented my work, as well as to all those interlocutors who provided insights, comments and suggestions on my presentations. Thanks to Beverly Brown, Brenna Bhandar and Nadje Al-Ali for significant conversations and suggestions in the early phases of this research.

I am extremely indebted for the invaluable research assistance provided during different phases of this book and on different chapters by Darshan Datar, Emily Jones, Upasana Garnik, Radhika Gupta, Adil Khan, Gauri Pillai, Surabhi Shukla, Apurva Tripathi and Latika Vashisht. I am immensely fortunate to have had the excellent support of Robin Gardner, Fiona MacDowall and the Melbourne Law School Academic Research Service. I am especially grateful to Cate Read for her rigour in polishing the text through her highly skilful, meticulous edits and inputs, and for the research assistance of Abbey Lay and Chris Kaisas. I would not have been able to acquire clarity and direction for the ideas that I have presented in this book had it not been for the time and effort of several colleagues and friends in being such patient readers of different chapters from this book. Each and every one has improved this book through offering helpful insights and constructive suggestions: Lakshmi Arya, Upendra Baxi, Brenda Cossman, Karen Engle, Gunter Franken-berg, Ben Golder, Kanchana Natarajan, Vasuki Nesiah, Dianne Otto and Isobel Roele. I would also like to thank Edward Elgar Publishing, in particular Stephen Gutierrez and Erin McVicar, for being consultative, thoughtful and unconditionally supportive throughout the publication process.

I am fortunate to have loved ones who, over many decades as well as during significant moments, have been the source of nourishment, encouragement and love in my life – Jyoti Sanghera, who saw the glint in my eye and encouraged me to write this book; and Kumar Shankardass, who revelled in describing himself as my number one heckler! Sadly, the heckler fell silent shortly after this manuscript was completed. Not only have they been my most important critics, but they did the caring and giving that kept me grounded and made it possible for me to attend to the nearly all consuming undertaking of writing this book. I am also grateful to my feline companions, Kaju and Misha, who have padded across innumerable drafts of each chapter, and weighed in heavily when it came to taking breaks and ensuring that I attended to the central tasks of their everyday lives – feeding, caring for and loving them.

I am so fortunate to have been constantly encouraged to write this book by those mentors and teachers who have sincerely believed in this project, and who have taught me to question the way in which we live now and encouraged me to think differently and to be otherwise. I could only dare to seek to move beyond the fishbowl and explore other constellations because of this inspiration.