While curiosity may often be seen to be an innate human characteristic, it often needs stimulation and/or a willing suitor. As a child growing up, my mother tried endlessly to engage me with reading. I am sure she must have seen a logical fit between written stories and my vivid imagination. While her initial efforts failed to enrol my curiosity, it clearly did not deter my parents from continuing their obvious love affair with books. Subconsciously, I grew to respect books as artefacts of obvious importance: I thank you both.

Despite still not having yet read a work of fiction, I have now been fully captured by my parents’ affliction; and to my mother and late father, I am truly indebted that they didn’t force me into the practice of reading, preferring to allow my curiosity to run out of other options; perhaps confident my insatiable curiosity would eventually be satisfied by books.

As an avid listener, I reflect on the many times I have listened to my peers wax lyrical of the ideas of a particular philosopher, scholar, educator and/or pundit. Through their initial introductions I have found many avenues of thinking opened up right before me. I hope that this book will also introduce you to many new ideas that have lain hidden away from your consciousness. While there may be few truly original ideas left to be had, there are a great many ideas out there still hidden from us all: keep looking.

To Andy and Kath Penaluna who have royally entertained my thinking, let us continue to think about our thinking. To Carol Langston and Alison Price who have supported the dissemination of my thinking, I salute you both. To Rebecca White at the University of Tampa, thank you for sharing your curiosity with me, I hope we can continue to reshape the thinking of those around us. To Professor Wang and Sarah Chang at Northeast Normal University in China, thank you for allowing our thinking to join. To Fiorina Mugione at the United Nations, thank you for allowing my thinking a voice in your global community. To David Gibson, thank you for inviting my thinking into your amazing adventures. To Doan Winkel and Norris Krueger in the United States, thank you for being open to contemplating different thinking. To David Yoo, Elin McCallum and Margherita Bacigalupo, thank you for continuing to inspire new thinking. Finally, to Rowena Barrett, thank you for offering me a new and challenging adventure where much of my thinking needs rethinking.
