

Acknowledgements

Many people have assisted me in the writing of this book – and there is, of course, a risk, that by mentioning some, I omit others. With apologies to those in the latter category, I would especially like to thank the following.

During the writing of this book I have been both a Professor in the Law School of Trinity College Dublin and, latterly, the University's Dean of Graduate Studies. I owe a significant debt of gratitude to my colleagues in both contexts who have been unrelentingly supportive and who make my working life a joy. I would like also to acknowledge those students who have studied Islamic Law with me over the last decade and whose thoughts have profoundly informed mine.

Many colleagues have given very particular assistance in helping me develop ideas and in reading and commenting on various drafts of chapters of this book. I owe a huge debt of thanks to Dr Julien Sterck (University of Essex), Professors William Binchy, Oran Doyle, David Kenny, Caoimhin MacMaolain and Suryapatim Roy of Trinity College Dublin and Professor Eoin Daly (NUI Galway) and Emeritus Professor Garret Barden (NUI Cork). I am also hugely grateful to Sharon Smith and Sondos Sidiqqi for their invaluable insights.

I am very grateful to Edward Elgar Publishing for their kindness and professionalism through the publication process. I would especially like to thank Amber Watts, Barbara Pretty and Carolyn Fox for all their work and their patience with me.

I acknowledge with deep gratitude the constantly helpful, incisive and supportive work of my research assistant and dear friend Louise Shearer.

Finally, I would like to thank my family, Sharon, Jessica, Jamie, Martha and Sebastian, for their support and kindness in all that my working life entails.

Neville Cox