

Acknowledgements

The ideas in this book can be traced back to debates and thoughts on copyright from my early years as a legal researcher. I wish to thank those who helped shape these formative experiences. Many generously shared their legal knowledge and skills with me when I was a research assistant at the Queensland University of Technology, in a specialist intellectual property research team led by Brian Fitzgerald. Anne Fitzgerald first took me on as an aspiring researcher, supervising my summer research project. Over the years, she has been a model of relentless determination, hard work and passion for scholarship. Neale Hooper was incredibly kind and generous with the time he took to review my written work and presentation drafts. I truly appreciate the support and mentorship I received as part of this research team.

My knowledge and views on copyright have also been enriched by time spent in the United States, at Columbia Law School and the United States Copyright Office. I am indebted to the professors and fellow students at Columbia who made the Master of Laws a thoroughly enjoyable and rewarding experience. I will treasure the depth of analysis and scholarly debate for years to come. The courses on Copyright Law and International Copyright Law, both run by Jane Ginsburg, were particularly memorable. The latter course (co-taught by Edouard Treppoz) piqued my interest in the making available right, an interest further fostered and developed at the United States Copyright Office. Maria Strong led the team that completed the report on the making available right and I thank her for the opportunity to provide background research for that report.

Beyond these early experiences, I am grateful for the support that I received while working on this book. I benefited greatly from John Gilchrist's constructive comments. His experience, diligence and critical eye kept me on my toes throughout the writing process. I am also indebted to Ben Atkinson, Jo Gray and Kylie Pappalardo for the stimulating debates, moral support and camaraderie. In addition, the opportunities to present this research at various national and international fora and the fruitful debate that followed have been invaluable. Gratitude is also owed to my colleagues and the professional staff at Curtin Law School, who have given me a supportive environment in which to produce this work. Of course, thanks goes to Peter Yu, the series editor, and the editorial team at Edward Elgar for bringing this project into fruition.

I come back to Brian Fitzgerald, who has been an instrumental force throughout my academic career. From the start, Brian integrated me into his research team. I was welcomed into a supportive environment, brimming with energy and ideas on how to better understand and improve IP laws around the world. His ability to incubate those ideas and bring the best out of people is impressive to say the least. Brian's wealth of knowledge, warmth and openness as a mentor allowed me to learn and grow, both as a scholar and a person. He had full confidence in my abilities and never doubted me, even when I doubted myself. His support of this work, in the form of critiquing drafts and testing arguments over countless conversations, is part of a decade of invaluable mentorship. For these reasons, I thank Brian.

Finally, I am grateful to my family. I thank my sister Rachel, who used to read Enid Blyton books to me as a child. From encouraging me to read, she has grown to inspire me with her dedication to research. More specifically, she took the time to read portions of early drafts despite having limited interest in copyright law and a busy career as a medical scientist. Most of all, I am thankful for my parents, who have always been there for me and believed in me. They have given me full support in every way possible. They trusted in the power of knowledge, encouraging my inquisitive nature and giving me the freedom to think, enquire and, most importantly, be me. My parents worked tirelessly to give their daughters the best education within their means. Thank you Mum and Dad. This work would not have been possible without your unwavering love and support.