These essays have been written over many years and with the help of many friends and colleagues. It should be no surprise then that I have many people to thank for their contributions and support.

First of all, I want to thank my wonderful co-authors, all of whom are good friends, who have contributed so much to these essays and who have generously allowed me to reprint them here: Julie Schor, Tom Ferguson, Arjun Jayadev and Juan Antonio Montecino. Thank you.

I also thank my close friends Grant Trippel for first suggesting that I study central banking many years ago, and Mark Breibart for the important early joint work we did on the subject and the many years of friendship and support. Thanks also to my good friend and PERI co-director Bob Pollin for his long-time support and collaboration. Bob's hard work and important insights on these and related topics have been a real inspiration to me.

Special thanks go to Tom Ferguson who, from the beginning of this work, has had an especially important influence on my thinking about political economy in general and central banks in particular.

In addition, I am grateful for the dedication and persistence of Tom Schlesinger who, for many years, worked tirelessly for a more democratic and accountable Federal Reserve. I thank Tom for trying to keep me grounded in the concrete struggles over these issues.

I have also benefited greatly from important material help over these decades: I thank the Institute for New Economic Thinking (INET) for financial support that was key to some of the recent essays collected here and to the Political Economy Research Institute (PERI) for general support. Esra Nur Ugurlu provided excellent assistance in pulling these essays together; and Alan Sturmer, Katia Williford, Victoria Froggett and their colleagues at Edward Elgar have done a first rate job on the publication end. I also want to thank an extremely talented illustrator, Alice Briggs, who created the cover art for Contested Control. Many others have supported my progress along the way and I would like to thank some of them here: they include Jim Boyce, Alan Blinder, Ilene Gabel, Robin Hollister, Bernie Safran, Bill Sweet, Doug Vickers and Erinç Yeldan.

And, of course, much of this work would never have been finished if Fran and Eli had not kept me on my toes.

Finally, I dedicate this book of essays to several of my teachers who have helped me in crucial ways over my career: to Stephen Goldfeld, my dissertation advisor who provided a skeptical but supportive ear for my earliest work in this area and who died way too young; to Jane D'Arista, who really taught me what central banking is all about; to Sam Bowles, who helped me think analytically about class and power in economics; and to Jim Crotty, my great teacher of macroeconomics. Thank you all.
