Acknowledgements

In writing a book such as this, there are inevitably many people to thank for their support in realising this project. Firstly, we are both indebted to the interview participants who graciously provided their time and experiences regarding their university collaborations. Without these insights the book would not exist. Secondly, we would like to thank Matthew Pitman of Edward Elgar for his support for the book and his encouragement to realise this project.

Andrew Johnston would firstly like to thank Robert for being the consummate co-author and mentor, not just in the course of writing this book, but over the last 14 years of their collaboration. He is also indebted to his colleague Jeremy Head for generously stepping in and looking after his module ‘Business in the European Economy’ while he was absorbed in writing this book. He would also like to thank his wife Amanda, and daughters, Violet and Elsie, for providing a welcome distraction from writing for the past year. Finally, the answer to the question ‘has Daddy finished his book?’ is, yes, he has!

Robert Huggins would firstly like to thank Andrew for conceiving and leading the project upon which much of this book is based. Their own collaboration dates back to 2006 when they first began to ponder on and figure out the nature, prevalence, and impact of university–industry links. Alongside Andrew, thanks should also go to Hiro Izushi, Kevin Morgan, Daniel Prokop, and Piers Thompson, all of whom have helped shape an understanding of innovation and the role of universities in processes of innovation and entrepreneurship. A very special thanks also goes to Angela who provides support and love in so many ways.
