Acknowledgments

This book is the culmination of twenty-seven years of experience. There are a lot of people who have helped, supported and guided me along the way. My parents, of course, who were unfailingly supportive of my leaving a good paying job to become an impoverished doctoral student and pursue an academic career. My advisors Joe Porac and Jim Wade, who taught me how to be a scholar and gave me the tools and opportunities to be successful. My many colleagues and co-authors over the years, from whom I’ve learned so much, and who have given me so many great writing experiences. In particular I’d like to thank Violina Rindova, who has been my friend and longest-running and best co-author. I’d also like to thank my friend and colleague of more than twenty years (and co-author) Ted Baker. It has been a joy to go through this academic journey with you. Ted also read every chapter (he was my Eulah-Beulah) and provided great suggestions. I even took some of them. I would also like to thank the rest of my friendly reviewer team, Jeff Lovelace, Yeonji Seo, and the members of my writing doctoral seminar: Ace Beorchia, Jaewoo Jung, Emily Landry, Trey Lewis, Ashley Roccapriore and Justin Yan. These folks all read and provided great feedback on the chapters as I developed them, and the students were fantastic guinea pigs as I worked out my ideas in class. That was truly one of the most fun teaching experiences of my life, even if the last five weeks were online due to Covid-19. I also owe a debt to the individuals who copy-edited my journal articles as they were prepared for publication, especially Persephone Doliner, Linda Johanson and Joan Friedman. What I’ve learned from these three women has made me a better writer. I must also thank my editor, Alan Sturmer for giving me the opportunity to write this book and his guidance through the process, and all the other folks at Edward Elgar who helped make it a reality. Most of all, I want to thank my wife Sarah. She’s been my biggest cheerleader throughout this process, read every chapter and provided many great comments. She’s also been my biggest supporter throughout my career, even though I dragged her out of Wisconsin and around the country on my academic vagabond’s journey. Finally, I’d like to thank my dog Maple, who has kept me company while I write, snorted impatiently when I was late taking her on walks, and has been a sweet, loving companion.
