Acknowledgements

The three-year research project on which the contributions to this book are based has benefited from the support and help of a number of people and institutions. We would like to thank Dr. Hingel, Nicole Dewandre and Fadila Boughanemi at DGXII of the European Commission. The research was funded under the Fourth Framework of Target Socio-Economic Research Programme (TSER). We are extremely grateful to Karin Reinsch, Christoph Albrecht and Hannelore Minzlaff at the WZB who have provided excellent administrative support for the financial management and co-ordination of the project as always. And to Niamh Warde who as an excellent copyeditor chased us up with friendly persistence.

The opportunity for our research group to meet on a regular six-month basis provided an important, concentrated working environment that is not always possible at large international conferences. We would like to thank Dr.
Marco Doujdeins at the OECD in Paris, Professor Jill Rubery, UMIST, Manchester and Professor Inmaculada Cebrián from the University of Alcalá, Madrid for hosting our interim meetings.

We would like to thank our publisher Edward Elgar for his continued support and interest in publishing our research. A number of authors have received feedback on their work from outside the research network and they are thanked personally in the individual chapters.

Finally, the authors of this volume would also like to thank Professor Günter Schmid both for his intellectual inspiration that provided the catalyst for the many debates coming out of this project, and also for his humanist dedication in attempting to search out new ways to deal with old and difficult problems. This book represents a collection of chapters which bring together economists, sociologists and lawyers who use both quantitative and qualitative methods from a comparative perspective to derive some insights into the nature of labour market transitions and their implications in different societies. In many ways we as authors and researchers have benefited immensely from this period of collaboration and exchange, and we hope that some of these benefits will be passed on to our readers.
