

Acknowledgments

Books are always the result of the effort of many people. A few of these receive credit in their roles as authors and editors; many others do not.

Here I would like to acknowledge some of those not obviously credited.

I thank the Lincoln Institute of Land Policy – specifically H. James Brown, President, and Armando Carbonell, Senior Fellow – for the grant which facilitated this book. It was the grant’s resources which provided the opportunity for the contributing authors to come together for a very stimulating two days in May 2002 at the Lincoln House in Cambridge, Massachusetts, where they presented the drafts of their papers to each other and argued over their respective points of view. And it was the grant’s resources which covered the editorial and other related costs which go into a project of this sort. H. James Brown’s and Armando Carbonell’s confidence in and commitment to this project, and much of my related work, is very much appreciated.

At the Lincoln Institute, I also want to thank Ms Ann LeRoyer, Senior Editor, for facilitating the introduction between Edward Elgar and myself.

A multidisciplinary edited book is an undertaking fraught with much complication and danger. Contributing authors have their own disciplinary conventions for writing, which can vary widely. To facilitate contributions, I invited authors to write as they normally would for their own publication venues. The task of bringing the mélange that resulted into a common form fell to Adam Jacobs, who provided masterful services as editorial assistant. He went through the manuscripts multiple times, and worked with them carefully. The overall quality and readability of the final manuscript is a result of his efforts.

This book follows on several decades of work by me in related areas of land-use and private property research. For their consistent and ongoing support of this line of scholarship and its related teaching endeavors, I want to thank my colleagues at the University of Wisconsin–Madison, in the Department of Urban and Regional Planning and the Gaylord Nelson Institute for Environmental Studies. Unfailingly, they have supported me no matter how I have articulated my professional interests.

Finally, I want to offer my deepest thanks and appreciation to my wife, Susan. She, more than anyone else, has stood with me. She has endured endless hours of conversation about land-use and property rights topics (some at very inopportune times), always with good humor. She has come to accept that I see the world with land-use and property rights glasses (even though she constantly reminds me there is more to the world than this perspective). And she is a reasoned cheerleader for me in my thoughts about new projects and undertakings, even though their realization often means too many hours spent in my study. For these reasons, as well as her companionship on our neighborhood walks and international travels together, I cannot thank her enough.
