The idea of this book emerged as a result of observing the long period of social destruction beginning with the Iranian Revolution, the massive emigration of Iranian intellectuals, and an eight-year war, through to the first and second Gulf wars. In a sense, this book is directly inspired by my personal experience regarding the importance of social destruction.

Thanks to the French Ministry of Higher Education and Research, I benefited from a sabbatical for one semester in 2001–2002 during which I intended to write a book on another topic on which I had already published a few articles. It was thanks to my first reader and wife, Sylvie Lupton, that I changed my plan one month before the beginning of my sabbatical leave, and devoted my energy to the preparation of the present book. I would therefore like to thank her for having encouraged me to write this book, and her suggested corrections both on the form and content.

My parents, Regin and Asghar, who always murmured in my ears that nothing is more important than acquiring knowledge, and encouraged me to read and write and supported me in doing so, will never be sufficiently thanked. I am also truly grateful to my sister, Mandana Vahabi (lotti ba marefat), without whose continuous assistance regarding references, this work (like many others) could not have been accomplished. She should also be warmly thanked for the editorial corrections of the whole manuscript. I would like to express my profound gratitude to Monique Lupton (Mamoushka) and Cynthia Damba (Mugande wange) who read the entire transcript, and improved its formal presentation.

I would also like to express my deep appreciation and gratitude towards my long time friend Christophe Defeuilley, who read the whole book and gave me good advice and comments, which I tried to incorporate as much as I could.

Needless to say, the author bears the responsibility for all the remaining errors.
