Contributors

EDITORS

Diane Perrons is director of the gender institute and a reader in economic geography and gender studies at the London School of Economics. Her research focuses on social and spatial divisions in the new global economy, paying particular attention to gender and regional inequalities. She is author of Globalization and Social Change: People and Places in a Divided World (Routledge, 2004) and co-editor of Making Gender Work (Open University Press, 1996). She is a coordinator of the ESRC seminar series 2005–2007 on Gender, Work and Life in the New Global Economy.

Linda McDowell is professor of human geography in the School of Geography and the Environment at the University of Oxford and Professorial Fellow at St John’s College. Her research interests are in the intersection of economic restructuring, labour market change and new class and gender divisions in contemporary Britain. She has undertaken several studies of labour market change in Britain including Capital Culture (Blackwell, 1997), Redundant Masculinities? (Blackwell, 2003) and Hard Labour (UCL Press, forthcoming). She is a coordinator of the ESRC seminar series on Gender, Work and Life in the New Global Economy, with Diane Perrons.

Kath Ray is a research fellow at the Policy Studies Institute. Her research interests include welfare to work policies, gender and work-life balance, race equality policies and gender and racialized identities. She completed her PhD at the University of Manchester in 2000 and has since held research positions at the University of Manchester and University College, London.

Kevin Ward is reader in geography at the School of The Environment and Development of the University of Manchester. He is co-author of Spaces of Work, Global Capitalism and the Geographies of Labour (SAGE Publications, 2003), Urban Sociology, Capitalism and Network Modernity (Macmillan, 2003) and Managing Employment Change: The New Realities of Work (Oxford University Press, 2002). He is also a co-editor of City of Revolution: Restructuring Manchester (Manchester University Press, 2002) and over 30 articles and book chapters. His research interests are state reorganization, the politics of urban development, territorial governance, and labour market restructuring.

CONTRIBUTORS

Susan Baines is a senior research associate in the Centre for Social and Business Informatics, University of Newcastle upon Tyne. She has more than ten years’ experience of applied social research and evaluation. Her work has been broadly concerned with economic restructuring, technological innovation and family life, and she has published extensively on those themes. She was principal investigator of a study on the work–life balance for self-employed parents under the Joseph Rowntree Foundation Work and Family Life Programme.

Ann Bergman is a senior lecturer in working life science at the University of Karlstad. Her research area is gender and work. In her dissertation she studied processes of segregation and integration in different types of organisations and job structures.

Jean-Yves Boulin is a sociologist, a researcher at the National Centre for Scientific Research (CNRS) and based at the Interdisciplinary Research Institute in Socio-Economy (IRIS) at the Paris-Dauphine University. His research interests focus on a broad range of working-time and time-related issues, including regulation of working time, the relations between working time and the other social times, time use studies, social organization of time and local time policies. He is member of the editorial committee of the ETUI journal Transfer, and of Futuribles, a French journal of future studies.
Contributors

Berit Brandth is a professor at the Department of Sociology and Political Science at the Norwegian University of Science and Technology in Trondheim, Norway. She is also affiliated with the Norwegian Centre for Rural Research. Her research focuses on gender, work and care politics, where one important focus has been fathers and parental leave. She is the author (with Elin Kvande) of the book Flexible Fathers (in Norwegian), and co-editor of Gender, Bodies and Work (Ashgate Publishing, 2005). Her research topics also include gender in agriculture- and forestry-based work which she has studied through such inroads as technology, organization, family and the agricultural media.

Michaela Brockmann completed her MSc in Comparative Social Research at the University of Oxford in 1998. She is now a research officer at the Thomas Coram Research Unit, Institute of Education, University of London. Her main interests include the integration of paid work and the family over the life course and she has been working on a number of cross-national research projects, funded by the EU, the Department of Health, and the ESRC. She is currently undertaking a PhD, examining the work and family ‘careers’ of childcare workers in Britain and Germany.

Brendan Burchell is a senior lecturer in the Faculty of Social and Political sciences at the University of Cambridge. His main research area concerns the interdisciplinary study of the relationship between labour markets and individual well-being, in particular job insecurity and work intensification. His publications include the book Job Insecurity and Work Intensification (Routledge, 2002).

James Cornford is a senior lecturer in the University of Newcastle upon Tyne Business School and co-director of the Centre for Social and Business Informatics. His research is focused around a number of themes including: the design, development and deployment of information systems in the public realm (including higher education and local government); the implications of the uptake and use of information and communication technologies for urban and regional development; and the industrial structure of the media industries.

Rosemary Crompton is professor of sociology at City University London. Her previous books include Restructuring Gender Relations and Employment (Oxford University Press, 1999), Women and Work in Modern Britain (Oxford University Press, 1997) and Renewing Class Analysis (Blackwell, 2000). Her current project, Class, Gender, Employment and Family, is part of the ESRC GeNet network (www.genet.ac.uk).
Contributors

Simon Duncan is professor in comparative social policy at the University of Bradford. His current research interests lie in the area of family lives and social policy, especially in parenting, partnering and the work–life balance; marriage, cohabitation and the law; and in the comparative analysis of gender inequality in welfare states. Before this he worked on the relative success and failure of different European housing systems. Recent books include Marriage, Cohabitation and the Law (Hart, 2005, with A. Barlow, G. James and A. Park) and Analysing Families (Routledge, 2003, edited with A. Carling and R. Edwards).

Melissa Fisher is assistant professor of Anthropology in the Department of Sociology and Anthropology at Georgetown University. She received her PhD in cultural anthropology from Columbia University. For her dissertation Dr Fisher conducted ethnographic fieldwork and archival research in New York City where she examined the career, networking and mentoring practices of the first generation of Wall Street women. She is currently transforming her study into a book. She is also the co-editor of a volume entitled Frontiers of Capital: Ethnographic Reflections on the New Economy (Duke University Press, 2006).

Lena Gonäs is professor of working life science at Karlstad University. Her research area is in labour market relations, gender segregation and employment policies. She has for many years been working at the National Institute for Working Life and is the scientific leader for a large multidisciplinary research project on Gender and Work, that is being reported during 2005.

Irene Hardill is professor of economic geography at the Graduate School, College of Business, Law and Social Sciences, Nottingham Trent University. Her research concerns the juggling of paid and unpaid work (unpaid caring activity as well as voluntary action) and household decision making. Recent publications include Gender, Migration and the Dual Career Household (Routledge, 2002).
Contributors

Hazel Johnstone has a BA in Social Anthropology and Sociology from Hull, an MSc in Social Anthropology from LSE and has been the manager of the Gender Institute at LSE since its inception. She oversaw the practical arrangements for the seminar series Work, Life and Time in the New Economy, as well as helping with the production of this book. She is also managing editor of the European Journal of Women’s Studies in her spare time.

Elin Kvande is a professor in work and organization studies at the Department of Sociology and Political Science at the Norwegian University of Science and Technology in Trondheim, Norway. Her research focuses on gender, work and organization, where she especially has written about flexible time cultures and gendered organizations. She is co-editor of Gender, Bodies and Work (Ashgate Publishing, 2005). Her research topics also include welfare state policies, where one important focus has been fathers and parental leave. She is the author (with Berit Brandth) of the book Flexible Fathers (in Norwegian).

Marie-Thérèse Letablier is a sociologist and research director in the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique in Paris. Her main research interests include work, family and gender issues from a European and a comparative perspective. She has been involved in several European research networks. Her publications include Families and Family Policies in Europe (with Linda Hantrais, Longman, 1996), Familles et travail: contraintes et arbitrages (with J. Fagnani, la Documentation Française, 2001) and ‘Work and family balance: a new challenge for politics in France’, in J.Z. Giele and H. Holst (eds), Changing Life Patterns in Western Industrial Societies (Elsevier, 2003).

Joost van Loon is professor of media analysis at the Institute for Cultural Analysis at Nottingham Trent University. His research concerns risk, media, technology, culture and everyday spaces. He has over 60 international publications, among which are Risk and Technological Culture (Routledge, 2002) and The Risk Society and Beyond (co-edited with Barbara Adam and Ulrich Beck, Sage, 2000). He is also co-editor of Space and Culture.

Jo Morris is senior equality and employment rights officer at the Trades Union Congress with more than 20 years experience of equality work in Britain and Europe, specializing in equal pay, part-time work, sexual harassment, working time organization and work–life balance. Jo combines a deep experience of policy-making roles – from the first UK legal challenge that established rights for part-time workers in 1982 to being a member of the social partner negotiating team for the European Directive on Part-time Work.
Contributors

– with 20 years’ practical experience of implementing innovative working-time arrangements in the public and private sectors. Jo has had a particular interest in developing mutually beneficial working-time models, particularly in the context of the gendered division of labour, and has managed work–life balance projects in local government, the Inland Revenue and other public sector organizations.

Anita Nyberg has been working at the National Institute for Working Life, Stockholm, Sweden since 1998, as a professor in gender perspective on work and economy. In 1995 she was appointed secretary of a governmental committee on the distribution of economic power and economic resources between women and men. This committee worked for three years between 1995 and 1998 and resulted in 13 different reports. She has been working as a lecturer in economics in the Economics Department and as a researcher at Theme Technology and Social Change at the University of Linköping. Her main areas of interest is women’s and men’s paid and unpaid work and their incomes.

Jane Pillinger is an independent researcher and policy advisor working in the areas of equality and diversity, working time and public service quality and is currently advising a number of Irish public sector agencies in the areas of equality, disability, health and homeless services. She has taught at Leeds University and Leeds Metropolitan University and was formerly the head of trade union studies at Northern College. Jane has been a specialist advisor to the House of Commons Select Committee on Employment and the Select Committee on Trade and Industry with a particular emphasis on flexible working time. In the last few years she has been working with the Public Services International and the International Labour Organisation on gender pay equity. She is author of Feminising the Market: Women’s Pay and Employment in the European Community (Macmillan, 1992), Working Time in Europe (ETUI and EPSU, 2002), and Quality in Public Services (European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions, 2001).

Silvia Posocco is tutorial fellow at the LSE Gender Institute. She was recently awarded her PhD in Secrecy, Subjectivity and Sociality: an ethnography of conflict in Petén, Guatemala (1999–2000). Her research interests lie in the areas of anthropological theory, notably epistemology, hermeneutics, ontology, nihilism; anthropology of secrecy; anthropology of Guatemala; violence and conflict; anthropology of development/governmentality; the anthropology of gender and sexualities; gender theory. Silvia designed and managed the web page for the ESRC seminar series Work, Life and Time in the New Economy, where early drafts of some of these papers were presented.
Harriet B. Presser is distinguished university professor in the Department of Sociology, University of Maryland, College Park. She is Past President of the Population Association of America (1989). In 2002, Professor Presser was elected a fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science for innovative research on issues of population, labour force, gender, and social inequality; for exceptional institution building; and for outstanding service to demographic and sociological societies. In addition to conducting basic research in social demography, Professor Presser studies population and family policy issues from a national and international perspective. Her recent publications include: Working in a 24/7 Economy: Challenges for American Families (Russell Sage Foundation, 2003) and ‘The female share of weekend employment: a study of 16 countries’ (with Janet C. Gornik), Monthly Labor Review, 128 (August 2005): 41–53.

Teresa Rees is a pro vice-chancellor at Cardiff University where she is also a professor in the School of Social Sciences. Her research focuses on gender mainstreaming in education, training and labour market policies. More recently she has conducted work on women and scientific careers in the European Union, acting as rapporteur for a number of European Commission high-level expert groups. She was a co-author of the Greenfield report on women in science, engineering and technology in the UK ‘SET Fair’. She also advises the National Assembly for Wales on equality policies and is a member of the DTI’s Commission for Equality and Human Rights Steering Group. She was elected an academician of the Academy of Social Sciences in 2002 and awarded a CBE for services to higher education and equal opportunities in 2003.

Kerstin Rosenberg is senior lecturer in gender studies at the University of Karlstad. She has a PhD in business economics and in her dissertation she studied the results from different job evaluation projects in Sweden. Her research areas are gender and wage formation with special reference to job evaluation.

Sarah Walsh is a research associate in the Centre for Social and Business Informatics, University of Newcastle upon Tyne. She largely focuses on qualitative research methods, specializing in ethnography. Her research includes the perceptions and expectations of technology within health and social care settings; user-perspectives on public services and multi-agency working within the public sector, specifically within children’s services.