The editor would like to express thanks for the patient and never-ending comprehension, love and goodwill of David, Chantal and Caroline during this second book project in regard to terrorism – I hope that they estimate that it was worth it. Also, the particular support of her parents, Ingrid and Rudolf Schmid, have made this volume possible.

The project for this book has crystallized since 11 September 2001, and, though self-standing, complements the works conducted for Terrorism and the International Business Environment – The Security–Business Nexus (Suder, 2004). It took shape and was launched at the Academy of International Business Annual Conference in Stockholm, July 2004, whose members I would like to thank for their involvement and support.

This volume contributes significantly to efforts in adapting corporate strategy and international operations to contemporary risk scenarios that are made by academia and professionals. It evolved into a collective undertaking due to a productive match of contributors coming together in a critical effort to undertake a cross-border and cross-disciplinary exercise. As editor, I was helped by a dynamic and very competent groups of contributors. Our gratitude also goes to the many colleagues and institutions whose participation and advice in our research and discussions was very welcome. At Edward Elgar Publishing, I benefited in particular from the professionalism of Francine O’Sullivan, who was once again of great help, and from the confidence of Edward Elgar.
