This volume is the culmination of a co-ordinated Anglo-German study between the Max Planck Institute and University College London, and represents a single research monograph rather than an edited collection. In studying how business manages its regulatory relationships in the UK and Germany, and how regulators evolve beyond their initial delegation of powers, this book provides a topical interpretation of regulatory reform in Europe. But it is also hoped that the results have practical and theoretical implications for how we analyse regulation and redesign regulatory institutions.

A comparative project of this size always depends on more than just the authors of the study. We would therefore like to thank all those who agreed to be interviewed in government, regulators and industry — without their reflective insights this project would have stalled at the first hurdle. Having collected our primary data we benefited from insights from academic colleagues and practitioners at our London and Bonn regulatory workshops. In particular we would like to thank Burkhard Eberlein, Edgar Grande, Jon Stern and Mark Thatcher. Finally we would like to extend thanks to Ray Cunningham and the Anglo-German foundation for funding the core of this project.

On the British side of the project, we would like to thank the Regulation Initiative at the London Business School for hosting and part-funding the early research, and individuals such as David Currie, Martin Sinner and Paul Willman for discussing aspects of the early research design. More recently, David Rowland (UCL) and Wyn Grant gave valuable comments on various drafts of the book. From the German perspective, special thanks should go to the Max Planck Foundation and the Bonn Max Planck Project group for also part-funding and hosting the project, and to Yannis Karagiannis at the European University Institute for his most valuable support.
