Almost all of the chapters (except Chapter 1) draw on material contained in, or are thoroughly revised and updated versions of, articles published in various scientific journals. The last chapter is co-authored with Christoph A. Schaltegger. I am grateful for permission to use this material.

Chapter 2 draws on an article entitled ‘What do we know about tax morale and tax compliance?’ published in RISEC: International Review of Economics and Business, 48 (2001), 395–419, and used by permission of CEDAM.

Chapter 3 uses material contained in article entitled ‘Speaking to theorists and searching for facts: tax morale and tax compliance in experiments’, published in the Journal of Economic Surveys, 16 (2002), 657–84, and used by permission of Blackwell Publishing.

Chapter 4 is based on the paper ‘The importance of faith: tax morale and religiosity’ which appeared in the Journal of Economic Behavior and Organization, 61 (2006), 81–109, and is used by permission of Elsevier.

Chapter 6 draws on material contained in ‘Tax morale in Latin America’, which appeared in Public Choice, 122 (2005), 133–57, and is used by permission of Springer Netherlands.

Chapter 7 uses material contained in the article ‘Does culture matter? tax morale in an East–West-German comparison’, published in FinanzArchiv, 59 (2003), 304–28, and is used by permission of Mohr Siebeck.

Chapter 8 is based on a paper ‘Moral suasion: an alternative tax policy strategy? Evidence from a controlled field experiment in Switzerland’, published in Economics of Governance, 5 (2004), 235–53, and is used by permission of Springer Verlag.

Chapter 9 uses material contained in ‘Tax amnesties and political participation’, jointly written with Christoph A. Schaltegger and published in Public Finance Review, 33, 403–31, and is used by permission of Sage Publications.
