This book is the latest product of an intellectual journey that is 20 years long and far from complete. Throughout this journey, I have been fortunate enough to receive the wonderful support of family and friends as well as a wealth of intellectual guidance and assistance from teachers, colleagues, collaborators, and students. Of these, I would like to single out and thank Ralph Shlomowitz (Flinders University), Matthew Clarke (RMIT University, Melbourne), Stewart Fraser (past teacher and now occasional mentor), and the members of the International Society of Ecological Economics (ISEE). Through regular contact and feedback with ISEE colleagues at both international and regional conferences, my knowledge and understanding of ecological economics has grown immensely. I have no doubt that this infusion of knowledge is a major reason why a book of such depth exists in front of you.

Whilst on the infusion of knowledge, I cannot go by, as with any major work of mine, without thanking Herman Daly – a man whose shoulders must be painfully bruised from having me stand on them for the last decade. Those with an intimate knowledge of Daly's work will have little difficulty identifying the extent of Daly's impact on this book and the intellectual debt I clearly owe him (despite having not met Daly to date). To a lesser degree, I could say the same about Kenneth Boulding, Nicholas Georgescu-Roegen, and Richard Norgaard.

As always, my greatest debt is owed to my parents Graham and Lesley Lawn. Whilst my mother sadly passed away some four years ago, without her love and support throughout my first 37 years of life, along with the continuing support of my father, this book would not exist at all.
