

Acknowledgments

Although writing a book is a fairly solitary activity, it is important to note the support, helpfulness and appreciation of others who have made my research work more pleasant and manageable.

Dick Hattwick, former editor of the Journal of Socio-Economics, is especially noteworthy for the interest he has taken in the earlier phases of my research. As Journal of Socio-Economics editor, he was able to appreciate my article, 'Good habits and bad habits: a new age socio-economic model of preference formation,' and he decided to publish it. A slightly revised version of this article appears here as Chapter 10.

Morris Altman is my friend and fellow traveler; he is the current editor of the Journal of Socio-Economics. Morris has been tireless in promoting and developing the Journal of Socio-Economics and behavioral economics in general. Morris seems to have appreciated my research and has been instrumental in getting a number of my articles published in the Journal of Socio-Economics. A number of these articles appear here in slightly revised form as chapters.

The late Ken Koford, former editor of the Eastern Economic Journal, recognized the value of my article, 'Personal capital and emotional intelligence: increasingly important sources of economic growth.' He provided very valuable editorial assistance that led to revisions and ultimately to this article's publication in the Eastern Economic Journal in 2003. That article appears here in slightly revised form as Chapter 6.

John Davis has been interested in and supportive of my research for a long time. During his tenure as editor of the Review of Social Economy, he was very helpful in the process of publishing my article, 'Human well-being: a new approach based on overall and ordinary functionings' in his journal. Unfortunately, he was not able to prevail over two referees' objections in the case of another article.

Over the years, I have benefited from the support and interest in my research of Shoshana Grossbard, Gary Lynne, Shlomo Maital, Mark Pingle and many others in the Society for the Advancement of Behavioral Economics, the association in which I have most actively participated.

I am indebted to Manhattan College for granting me two year-long sabbatical leaves, one in 1999–2000 and the other in 2005–6, that enabled me to accomplish key parts of this book's research.

I appreciate the interest that the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute Economics Department showed in my research and that they invited me to present several of my research papers at their seminars during each of my sabbaticals. They were generous in giving me permission to be a RPI Visiting Scholar enabling me, among other things, to have full access to their library during these sabbatical periods.

Tom Sadler is the coauthor of our article, 'Why we need a commitment approach to environmental policy,' also appearing here as Chapter 13. It was a pleasure to know Tom at Manhattan College and to interact with him on this research. It is regrettable that he is no longer at Manhattan College.

Last, but not least, is my beautiful, loving wife, Doris, who in addition to being supportive of my research has done much to create the kind of home environment that has enabled me to be productive in my research.
