I have always been interested in the application of organizational psychology’s research findings to improve the lives of individuals inside and outside of the workplace. Although my PhD from the University of Michigan was in organizational psychology and obtained in the Department of Psychology, I have only worked in schools of management since then, believing that these units were more strongly interested in building healthy organizations and healthy people. The attacks of 9/11 in the US raised some new challenges for individuals and their employing organizations, hence this collection. Other incidents since then that have occurred in several other countries have reinforced the importance of this topic for organizational leaders, government policy makers and academic writers and researchers. The world has become a more dangerous place.

I want to acknowledge my association with Cary Cooper. Cary and I have previously worked together in producing other volumes; I continue to value his friendship, energy and talents.

Both Cary and I would like to thank our international contributors for sharing their latest thinking. Gerry Wood, at Lancaster University, was outstanding in working with our authors in coordinating the manuscripts and linking with Edward Elgar. Pulling this off would have been significantly more difficult without her. As always, the staff at Edward Elgar was first rate. The preparation of this collection was supported in part by York University, Canada, and Lancaster University, UK.

Finally, I would like to thank family, friends and colleagues who have supported me during the journey.
