This book is dedicated to my wife Shamika, and my children, Mario and Andrea. They have adapted to a new academic’s lifestyle. Without the usual material comforts that came with my earlier lucrative corporate career, my family had to make considerable sacrifice. In this transitory period, my children often remind me that we have moved into two countries, seven houses and enrolled them into four new schools, all during the last eight years. They have endured a lot for me to pursue my dreams. I thank them wholeheartedly for their patience and support.

I express my sincere appreciation and gratitude to Brad Jackson and Marion Maddox, who guided and encouraged me to complete this study. Without their support and mentorship, this wouldn’t have been possible. I was very fortunate to have their understanding of my passion for the topic and the encouragement to develop a critical perspective to my research.

Unreserved gratitude must go to the 13 entrepreneur leaders of this study, many of whom are still volunteering their time to my current research projects. These leaders gave their valuable time with enthusiasm and opened themselves to enquiry in this most personal of subjects. At times, I felt humbled by their willingness to share deeply-held personal beliefs with me. I am extremely grateful to them.

Some sections of this book have been previously presented as conference papers, book chapters and journals articles. I am grateful to the copyright holders and my co-authors for granting me the rights to use the material in this book. Special thanks go out to Brad Jackson, Scott Burrows, Michael Gross and Frederick Beale. Every endeavour has been made to secure legal copyrights.

Many thanks go to my mentors, colleagues and fellow researchers from the Victoria Management School; Religious Studies Department at Victoria; the Management, Spirituality and Religion group at the Academy of Management; those at Spirit at Work in New Zealand, and my colleagues from the School of Management and Marketing at University of Wollongong, especially, Trevor Spedding and James Reveley, for understanding my passion and drive for the topic, and all the encouragement and mentoring support offered without which this would not have become a reality.

Special thanks to Gary Geroy for an insightful foreword, Ralph Piedmont for promotional support, Thoron Hollard for editorial support on an earlier version of this manuscript, and all my friends at Edward Elgar, especially Fran, Jo, Bob and Catherine. Also my good friends, Manju and Sunethra Fernando are fondly remembered for their critique, support and encouragement in numerous ways during the project.

Last but by no means least, I express my sincere gratitude to my parents, Stanley and Felicia, who instilled the value of learning, and proudly stood by me in all my academic endeavours.
