

Contributors

---

Patrizia Battilani (University of Bologna) took her Ph.D. in Economics at the University of Bologna. She is now professor of Economic History. She has published several books and essays on tourism history and on the history of cooperative enterprises.

Lucia Castellucci (University of Firenze) took her Ph.D. in Economic and Social History at Bocconi University, Milano.

Andrea Colli (Bocconi University, Milano) took his Ph.D. in Economic and Social History at Bocconi University. He is now professor of Economic History. He is specialized in Business History, and his fields of interest are: the structure and evolution of SME, the role of family firms in modern economic growth, corporate governance in a comparative and historical perspective, and foreign direct investments in the long run.

Leandro Conte (University of Siena) took his Ph.D. at the University of Napoli. He is now professor in Economic History and has published in academic journals on financial markets and business history.

Simone Fari (University of Torino) took his Ph.D. in Economic History at the University of Bari. He is now research fellow in Economic History and research fellow in Technological History at the Science Museum of London.

Francesca Fauri (University of Bologna) took her Ph.D. in Economic History at the European University Institute, Firenze. She holds a Jean Monnet Chair in European Economic History. She has extensively published on issues concerning the history of European economic integration and Italy's postwar economic and business history.

Renato Giannetti (University of Firenze) is professor in Economic History. His publications cover the history of technology and business history, especially the Italian experience from Unification to the present day.

Andrea Giuntini (University of Modena and Reggio Emilia) took his Ph.D. in Economic History at the University of Napoli. He is now professor in Economic History. His research covers contemporary economic history and his main fields are: history of networks, energy, transport and communications, and urban history.

Fabio Lavista (Bocconi University, Milano) took his Ph.D. in Economic and Social History at Bocconi University. He is now fellow at the Department of Institutional Analysis and Public Management.

Giuseppe Maria Longoni (University of Milano) is lecturer in Contemporary History. His main research interests, particularly focused on Lombardia, include labour history, trade and business association history.

Mario Perugini (Bocconi University, Milano) took his Ph.D. in Economic and Social History at Bocconi University in 2009 with a dissertation on the history of the Italian chemical industry in the 1930s. He is now research assistant at the Department of Institutional Analysis and Public Management.

Giandomenico Piluso (University of Siena) took his Ph.D. in Economic and Social History at Bocconi University, Milano. He is now lecturer in Economic History, and the editor of Imprese e storia, the Italian business history journal. He has published extensively on economic history and business history, concentrating on financial institutions.

Alberto Rinaldi (University of Modena and Reggio Emilia) took his Ph.D. in Economic and Social History at Bocconi University, Milano. He is now lecturer in Economic History. His research interests cover the 18th to the 20th centuries, focusing in particular on industrial districts and local production systems, interlocking directorates and international investment.

Valentina Romei (Financial Times, London) took her Ph.D. in Economic History at the European University Institute, Firenze. She is now working as a statistical researcher.

Pier Angelo Toninelli (University of Milano-Bicocca) is professor of Contemporary and Business History at the Department of Economics. He has published extensively on different historical subjects such as state-owned enterprise, accounting, methodology and economic development.

Michelangelo Vasta (University of Siena) took his D.Phil. in Economic History at the University of Oxford. He is now professor in Economic History. His main interests concern Italian economic development focusing on both micro- and macroeconomic topics such as technical change in historical perspective, trade and growth, business history and corporate governance.

Vera Zamagni (University of Bologna) took her D.Phil. in Economic History at the University of Oxford. She is professor of Economic History and visiting professor of European Economic History at the Bologna Centre of the Johns Hopkins University. Her main publications cover Italian economic history with special reference to national income estimates, regional disequilibria, income distribution and wages, state intervention, business history, evolution of the cooperative movement and European integration.