During the spring semester of 2006, I was offered a stay as visiting professor at the Center for Public Policy Administration (CPPA), University of Massachusetts, USA. A financial award from the American Scandinavia Foundation (ASF) made it economically possible for me to accept this opportunity. At the Center, I lectured and conducted a graduate class on European integration issues. Research and papers which I prepared for class lectures formed the starting point for the writing of this book. I would like to take this opportunity to thank ASF for their generosity and courteous treatment. Further, I would like to thank my colleagues at the CPPA for an interesting stay, and the students for interesting discussions and scholarly critique. Last but not least, special thanks and my gratitude go to my good friend for many years Eric S. Einhorn, professor and expert on the Scandinavian welfare state and a good colleague at the CPPA.

Over the years, many people have contributed to my knowledge and thoughts about public sector transformation, the Scandinavian welfare state model,¹ the regulatory regime of the EU, and issues of public innovation. I would like to particularly acknowledge the following colleagues at Lillehammer University College: Rolf Rønning, Håvard Teigen, Tor Selstad, Jon Helge Lesjø, Liv Solheim, Ulla Higdem, Tor Helge Pedersen, Jan Andersen and Olav R. Spilling. As a team, we have worked together for many years towards the establishment of the Center for Innovative Policy and for research performance in the field. It has been of utmost value for me to think in terms of innovation when writing this book.

NOTE

1. In this context the EU Commission impact study ‘The Nordic countries: what impact on planning and development in the Union?’ (Veggeland 1995a), and the Scandinavian research teamwork behind it, inspired me greatly to further research in the field of European social models.
