Contributors

Ruud Muffels is Professor of socio-economics (labour market and social security science) at the Department of Sociology and research professor at the Institute for Labour Studies (OSA) at Tilburg University. He is also fellow at REFLECT, the Research Institute on Labour Market Dynamics and Flexicurity, and NETSPAR, the Network for Studies on Pensions, Ageing and Retirement. His main research interests deal with labour market dynamics, income distribution and social exclusion, comparative analyses of the welfare state and the socio-economics of ageing. He has published in a wide range of sociological, economic and interdisciplinary journals and co-edited a number of international academic volumes.

Jean-Claude Barbier is research director (CNRS, Sociology) at the Centre d'économie de la Sorbonne, Université Paris I, équipe Matisse. He works on the international comparison of social policies, social protection systems and employment policies. He is also studying the European Employment Strategy, from the point of view of the dissemination of ideas. He conducts research on the epistemological and methodological issues arising from the international comparative stance. He has been active in numerous European networks, including the TLM.net project and its Transwell follow up.

Annelies Debels is researcher at the Centre for Sociological Research at the University of Leuven, Belgium. She finished her thesis on poverty in April 2008. Her research interests include poverty, labour market flexibility, methodology and ageing issues. She has published in international journals on these issues.

Virginia Hernanz is Professor of Economics at the Universidad de Alcalá since 2001. Before, she has been research assistant at the Fundación de Economía Aplicada (FEDEA) and post-doc fellow at Bocconi University. Her main research interests include labour market flexibility, temporary work, working time transitions and training. She has published widely in international journals and book chapters on these issues.
Federica Origo is currently assistant professor at the economics department of the University of Bergamo but previously engaged as a senior researcher at IRS, the Institute for Social Research in Milan. Her main research interests include labour market transitions, non-standard contracts and wage differentials. She has published in journals on these issues.

Manuela Samek Lodovici is president of IRS, the Institute for Social Research in Milan, where she is also the head of the Labour Market Department. She is also professor of Labour Economics at the Università Cattolica in Milan, at the Università Cattaneo (LIUC) in Castellanza and at the Sociology Department at the Università di Milano-Bicocca. Her main areas of research include the comparative analysis of Labour Market Trends and Labour Regulation Systems and the evaluation of Labour and Equal Opportunity Policies. She has acted as an expert in numerous European networks and has carried out consultancy for the European Commission.

Luis Toharia is professor of Economics at the Universidad de Alcalá since 1980. He has published widely in international journals and academic volumes on a variety of issues among which the measurement of unemployment, flexible contracts, part-time work and labour market transitions. He has served as consultant for many Spanish public institutions, including the Ministry of Labour, the Public Employment Services of Spain and several regions, the regional governments of Catalonia and Andalusía, the National Statistical Institute and the Statistical Institute of Andalucía.

Mieke Booghmans and Seppe van Gils are researchers at the Policy Research Centre Work and Social Economy, an applied research institute in the city of Leuven, Belgium. They share an interest in research on labour markets, employment transitions and social security.

Caroline Vermandere is researcher at the department of labour and organisation of the Higher Institute for Labour (HIVA) in Leuven, Belgium. The Institute conducts applied research in the area of labour market, the labour organisation and social security.

Ruud Luijks is associate professor of Sociology at the Department of Sociology at Tilburg University, Netherlands. He has contributed to international benchmark studies on social mobility and has published widely in international journals and academic volumes in the field of (educational) heterogamy, social inequality, career mobility, labour market transitions and loglinear and latent class analysis.
Markus Gangl is professor of Sociology at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. His main research interests are in labour market dynamics, job mobility and unemployment, and the relationship of labour market processes with patterns of income inequality and social stratification. He has published on these issues in the American Journal of Sociology, the American Sociological Review, the European Sociological Review and other international journals.

Nigel Meager is Director of IES, the Institute for Employment Studies of the University of Sussex in Brighton, United Kingdom. His main research interests include self-employment dynamics, long-term unemployment and European labour market issues in general. He has published widely in a number of European sociological journals and in international academic volumes.

Didier Fouarge studied economics at the Facultés Universitaires Notre-Dame de la Paix (FUNDP) in Namur, Belgium. He holds a PhD from Tilburg University on the topic of poverty dynamics and social policy in Europe. From 1999 to 2007 he was researcher at the Institute for Labour Studies (OSA) and post-doc at Tilburg University. Since November 2007, he is researcher at the Research Centre for Education and the Labour Market (ROA), Maastricht University. His main research interests lie in scientific and applied research on labour market and income dynamics, working times, retirement, income distribution and poverty, and the welfare state. He published in national and international Journals as well as in books with distinguished publishers. For a full CV, see: <www.roa.unimaas.nl/cv/fouarge/fouarge.htm>.

Govert Bijwaard (PhD) is a post-doctoral researcher at the Econometric Institute at Erasmus University. He got a VENI grant from the Dutch National Science foundation NWO for his study on the Dynamic Economic Aspects of Migration. His research interests include migration, labour econometrics and labour market transitions.

Bram van Dijk is a PhD student at the Tinbergen Institute and at the Econometric Institute at Erasmus University Rotterdam. His research interests include labour market econometrics, human capital, training and working time transitions issues. He has published his work in international journals.

Jaap de Koning is professor of labour market policy at the Erasmus University Rotterdam and director of SEOR, a research institute of the same university. His main research interests are the evaluation of labour market policies, the economics of training, labour market forecasting and education and social economics.

Stephen Ziguras is honorary researcher at the Centre for Public Policy of the University of Melbourne, Australia. He has previously been affiliated as a researcher with the Brotherhood of St. Lawrence in Melbourne. His research interests include labour market policies, social inequality and employment transitions.

Peter Stricker is a researcher at the Centre for Public Policy at Melbourne University, Australia. His main interests deal with labour markets, labour market policies and labour market transitions.

Axel van den Berg is professor of Sociology at McGill University in Montreal, Canada. He has been a Marie Curie Incoming International Fellow at SISWO/Social Policy Research and the Amsterdam Institute for Advanced Labour Studies (AIAS) in 2004 and 2005. His research interests include the sociology of labour markets and the relation between sociology and economics.

Claus-H. von Restorff currently works for the Canadian federal government in Ottawa, while completing his PhD in Economics from McGill University in Montreal, Canada. His main areas of interest are labour market transitions and the importance of various forms of human capital in self-employment.

Daniel Parent is associate professor of Economics at McGill University in Montreal, Canada, holder of a Dawson Chair. He specialises in labour economics and applied econometrics. His current research focuses on the impact of pay-for-performance schemes on wage inequality as well as on employment. He also examines how performance pay affects white–nonwhite wage differentials across the wage distribution.

Anthony C. Masi is professor of Sociology and the Provost of McGill University in Montreal, Canada. He has been a visiting professor in Italy at Bari (1987; 1994) and Pisa (1990), was the Jemolo Fellow in Italian Studies at Nuffield College, Oxford (1993), and from 1996 to 2000 was Visiting Research Fellow at the Italian National Institute of Statistics in Rome. He has published on labour force, industrial policy and the relationship between institutions and economic development in Italy as well as comparative studies of labour market flexibility in Canada and Sweden.
Per Kongshøj Madsen is professor at Aalborg University and director of CARMA at the Department of Economics, Politics and Public Administration. His main research interests include comparative labour market analysis and European employment policy. Since 1997 he has been a member of the European Employment Observatory. He has published widely in journals and international academic volumes on the issue of flexicurity and the Danish flexicurity model.