Acknowledgements

This book could not have been written without the support, encouragement and contributions of many colleagues. First and foremost, I wish to acknowledge the work of Pankaj C. Patel. More than anyone else, he made this book possible. We began working together five years ago when he was my MBA research assistant. That relationship has continued during the last three years as we have worked even more closely together while he has been pursuing a PhD in entrepreneurship. As the founder and director of the program, I recruited and trained him and we have worked together on every project since. At this point, he now takes the lead in many of the projects that we work on together, including some of the chapters in this book. He made the most substantial contributions to Chapter 6, which is a meta analysis of multiple trials, Chapter 7, which concerns the relationship between systematic search and firm founding, as well as to Chapter 8 on forgiving business models. However, he has also contributed in substantial ways to some of the other chapters. When I acknowledge his contributions to this book by noting that it was written with his assistance, this is not a token acknowledgement that he has not earned. Without his contributions, this book would have taken a very different form. He has earned his place on the title page many times over.

I would also like to acknowledge the contributions and support of my colleagues at the University of Louisville. These include Karen Bishop, Van Clouse, Mahesh Gupta, Robert Nixon and Bill Norton. Each of these colleagues contributed to either the testing and reporting of the experimental trials or to the case studies of repeatedly successful entrepreneurs.

More recently, the learning environment at the University of Louisville’s College of Business has been enriched by the arrival of Melissa Baucus and a large contingent of talented and motivated doctoral students who have challenged all of us to be ready to think and re-think. Others who have contributed to the scholarly environment at UofL are Art Adams, Mike Barone, Reg Bruce, David Dubofsky, Richard Germain and Bruce Kemelgor; as well as my department head, Lyle Sussman, and dean, Charlie Moyer. Lyle Sussman is the best department head anyone could ever hope to have. Dean Moyer has encouraged the many elements of entrepreneurship in the College to work in tandem in “Entrepreneurship Louisville,” which once again has created an environment to where we all want to come to work, and which has resulted in the College’s entrepreneurship programs achieving high national rankings. Also, I acknowledge Robbie Altman, my capable administrative assistant, who has kept the entrepreneurship doctoral program running smoothly while I was lost in research. Finally, I would like to acknowledge the contributions of Howard Aldrich, Jay Barney, Per Davidsson, Charles Hofer, Simon Parker, Scott Shane and Dean Shepherd, each of whom teaches a seminar in our doctoral program and who has stimulated the scholarly environment in which I have been fortunate to work.

Underlying and undergirding all of my work is the support of my wife, Terry, and our family who have been constants that have provided meaning for many labors, including the one that you are reading. To them, I will be eternally grateful.
